argument in favour of the adoption of the Report of the Joint Committee. I protest against this imperfect scheme of yesterday—a quite recent innovation—being treated as if it were a time-honoured institution, not to be touched without hazard by any innovating hand, when the secular system of Purchase, though it had worked well, had been superseded by the competitive system, because that was expected to work better. Secondly, I protest against the bugbear of hopeless impracticability being raised against the additional examination recommended by the Joint Committee, when they indicate so plainly how easy and practicable would be the means of carrying it out with regard to the limited number of candidates which would have to be dealt with. Thirdly, I protest against the ignorant talk of literary and educational enthusiasts about the supreme importance of book-learning and high intellectual culture, and the unimportance of physical strength and activity in officers—placing a knowledge of Chaucer above skill in riding, and a knowledge of Lucretius above swimming. Fourthly, I protest against a bounty being given at the expense of the country to the less wealthy in the shape of the admission to the Army of candidates of their class giving less promise of future efficiency as officers, in the place of candidates from a richer class giving greater promise of efficiency as officers. Let the country get the best officers it can for its money; not merely the most learned, but the best officers all round—as far as these can be tested and selected by examination.

LORD DORCHESTER said, he had great pleasure in supporting the views of his noble Friend who had just sat down (Earl Fortescue). The subject to which his noble Friend had called attention was of the utmost importance and deserved every consideration at the hands of their Lordships, and he believed that there was no tribunal better qualified to give an opinion on the subject than their Lordships’ House. In addition to the Report to which his noble Friend had alluded, there was another, the Report of Lord Airey’s Committee on the Organization of the Army, which he regretted had not been presented. That Report was sure to ooze out through the newspapers. He thought it ought to be produced.

EARL GRANVILLE rose to Order, and suggested to the noble Lord that it was irregular to allude to a Report not before the House, and which was on a subject not before the House.

LORD DORCHESTER said, he accepted the noble Earl's apology. [Much laughter.] He begged pardon—he bowed to his reproof; but he might add that he believed the Report to which he had alluded would throw much light on the matter. He begged to support his noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) in every observation he had made. Good riding was, of course, indispensable in the Cavalry; but he held, from his own experience of 25 years, that it was highly useful to Infantry officers and to Naval officers also. [Laughter.] He repeated that it was useful for Naval officers, who occasionally might have to ride with despatches across a strange country. It was a well-known fact that a distinguished member of the Naval Profession had obtained great credit in the Crimea for carrying despatches on horseback in an enemy's country.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that as his noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) had alluded to the Report of the Joint Committee, he wished to explain, as representing the Civil Service Commission, that the Commissioners saw no paramount difficulties in the way of a physical competition in the case of candidates for the Army; but, at the same time, they felt that unless they should be adequately supported in that view not only by the authorities at the Horse Guards and the War Office, but also by public opinion outside their Lordships' House, no steps ought to be taken by them. If they were asked to do so, they were perfectly ready to carry out such alterations in the examinations for entrance to the Army as would secure a mixture of physical competition with other subjects now required of candidates. The inquiry originated in this way. On the 20th of December, 1877, Lord Hampton made a private suggestion on this subject to the Secretary of State for War. Soon after the Civil Service Commissioners, through their Secretary, wrote to the Director General of Military Education, assenting to a conference on the subject, as suggested by Mr. Gathorne Hardy, the then Secretary of State for War. In February, 1878, the Joint Committee met in Cannon Row—Lord Hampton, Sir George Dasent, and Mr. Walrond, as Civil Service Commissioners; the Director General of Military Education (Lieutenant General Beauchamp Walker), the Assistant Military Secretary (Major General R. B. Hawley), and the Assistant Adjutant General (Colonel G. R. Greaves), representing the military authorities. Previously to making their Report, which they did on the 26th of April, 1878, the Joint Committee circulated questions on the subject of their inquiry to General W. C. E. Napier, Governor of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst; Major General Sir John Miller Adye, Governor of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich; Major General Sir Archibald Alison, Governor of the Staff College at Aldershot; and to the head masters of these 18 public schools—Charterhouse, Cheltenham, Clifton, Dulwich, Eton, Harrow, Haileybury, Malvern, Marlborough, Merchant Taylor's, Repton, Rugby, Sherborne, St. Paul's, Westminster, Wellington College, Winchester, and Uppingham. He thought he was correct in saying that out of the replies received from the 21 military and civil authorities thus consulted, 14 were variously though not wholly favourable to the proposed scheme, and that while those distinguished persons who were favourable to it thought with the Joint Committee that there would be an advantage in having a physical as well as a literary examination, they, as well as the Joint Committee, were of opinion that the former ought not to be compulsory. The subjects recommended by the Joint Committee for physical competition were riding, walking, running, leaping, swimming, and gymnastics; but they recommended that the candidate should only be at liberty to select three out of the six subjects, and that the maximum number of marks for them should be 1,200. The Report of the Committee was sent in on the 26th of April, 1878, and on the 28th of the same month another conference was held between the Civil Service Commissioners and the War Office Representatives; but nothing definite was agreed upon, the Civil Service Commissioners not regarding themselves as having any authority to undertake examinations under the proposed scheme, except in the circumstances he had already indicated. There was this Memorandum—

“At a meeting held at the Office of the Civil Service Commission on May 28, 1878, in pursuance of a letter from the Director General of Military Education, dated the 24th of that month—present, Lord Hampton, Lieutenant General Walker, Sir George Dacent, Mr. Walrond—General Walker having, after some preliminary discussion, suggested that the Commissioners should put themselves in communication with such persons as they might think fit with the view of settling the method of carrying out the proposed physical competitions for the Army, the Commissioners stated that they did not regard themselves as having authority at present to take any action in the matter, but that they would be quite willing to undertake the arrangement and superintendence of such examinations if informed that it was the wish of the Secretary of State for War and His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief that they should do so, and General Walker was requested to report to His Royal Highness accordingly.”

From the 28th of May, 1878, nothing more was done in the matter till the 28th of February, 1879, when his noble Friend brought it under the notice of their Lordships' House. On that occasion, it appeared that the Commander-in-Chief and the then Under Secretary of State for War (Viscount Bury) were not favourable to the proposed alterations. The Under Secretary of State said—

“It was true that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War was at first disposed to carry out the recommendation of the Committee; but on considering it, and taking the opinion of military authorities, he found that difficulties of an insurmountable nature presented themselves against giving effect to it, and therefore he would not advise the Government or Parliament to endeavour to carry it out.”—[3 Hansard, cccliii. 1951.]

The illustrious Duke said, in the same debate—

“He felt strongly with noble Lords who had addressed the House; but he must honestly confess that when he came to the question of bringing the proposed system into practice, he found it would be utterly impossible to do so—he did not himself see how it could be done; and two distinguished officers, who signed the Report, being present when the question was further discussed, could not give any plan as to how their own recommendation could be carried out. If the recommendation should be adopted, it would change the whole present system of education, and changing the whole system was an extremely grave matter. . . . There might be very good grounds for doing this, and possibly there might be found a reason for combining the two things; but, he and his noble Friend at the War Office having given every consideration to the matter, he did not see how it was possible to combine the two things. . . . The other day his representative, General Lyons, the Quartermaster General, went down to Sandhurst, and he said that he never saw a finer or a better set of young men than he saw there. . . . He (the Duke of Cambridge) himself had also been struck with the qualifications of the young men.”—[Ibid. 1592-3.]

After those two speeches, the Civil Service Commissioners did not think it right to take any step in the matter, though they were not opposed to the proposed changes, if the Horse Guards and the War Office authorities thought them desirable for the welfare of the Army. He (Viscount Enfield), however, believed he was correct in stating that the late Secretary for War and the Commander-in-Chief were opposed to any action being taken in the matter. For himself, he did not see how the scheme could be worked out. A better class of young men than they obtained at present could not be had. The Commissioners themselves deprecated the continually stirring up of this question, which only unsettled the minds of parents of candidates and of tutors, who did not know what alterations in the system of Army examinations might be contemplated. Besides, all history and all experience showed that it was quite possible to combine the highest military education and knowledge even with a somewhat deficient physical exterior. He begged to remind his noble Friend that Lord Macaulay, referring to the Battle of Neerwinden, mentioned—

“The hunchbacked dwarf who urged forward the fiery onset of France, and the asthmatic skeleton who covered the slow retreat of England.”

No doubt, physical qualifications were of great importance; but he thought that if the preliminary private medical examination which preceded the literary examination was fairly carried out, in all probability no officer physically incompetent could be admitted into the Army; and that if it were a real and a tolerably stringent one, the test of physical competence for entering the Army would be solved in, perhaps, a more satisfactory manner than by making the candidates run, jump, swim, or ride, as the noble Earl wished. At the same time, his Colleagues and himself were only anxious to meet the wishes of the military authorities and the public in a matter of such vital interest to the future discipline and well-being of the Army; and with respect to any difficulties that there might be in the way of carrying out these alterations, he would venture to paraphrase an old French proverb, and say—"If it is difficult, it is done; if it is impossible, it shall be done." He repeated, however, that the Civil Service Commissioners claimed an unmistakable expression of opinion to guide them in the conduct of these examinations.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that while, no doubt, there was a considerable consensus of authority in favour of what his noble Friend (Earl Fortescue) proposed, he (the Earl of Morley) ventured to say he would succeed in showing that the authorities were not so unanimous on the subject as his noble Friend seemed to suppose. There could be no doubt of the proposition that it was desirable the officers of the British Army should be physically capable of withstanding the difficulties which they had to encounter from changes of climate and other causes in all parts of the world; but as to the plan now before the House, it was condemned last year by the illustrious Duke at the head of the Army, who, when speaking on the subject, while admitting the desirability of physical training, said he did not see how it should be allowed to take the place of intellectual capacity. He (the Earl of Morley) believed that his Royal Highness adhered to the opinion which he at that time expressed. Now, he put it to their Lordships that, on consideration of it, this plan would be found unnecessary and undesirable; and, even if it were practicable, it would be almost impossible to carry out. He would now call attention to the recommendations of the Joint Committee; but he would, in the first place, remind the House that they considered that nothing should be done to interfere with the reward of superior mental training. He did not, however, think the Committee, who had not gone into details, showed in their Report how a physical competition of the kind suggested by them could be introduced without interfering with the rewards given to superior intellectual merit. The physical tests proposed by them were six in number, and any candidate was to be allowed to take up three of them, and no marks were to be given unless the candidate reached a certain efficiency. As to the first subject they recommended—riding, he did not concur with his noble Friend in thinking that the rich would have no advantage in a competition in that branch. His experience might be different from that of his noble Friend; but he thought that keeping horses and riding them was an expensive amusement, and it was not every young man who had a desire to satisfy this test who could afford to keep a horse in the exercise of which he might acquire that qualification. Then, in walking, the minimum rate was to be a mile in 10 minutes, or six miles an hour. Many young men could attain that speed; but, as a minimum, it was preposterously high, and he would like to know how many candidates would succeed in walking at that pace? The test for running was one mile in five and a-half minutes. The minimum for jumping was 4 feet 6 inches, and for the leaping 15 feet. Need he say more? He did not think that many candidates would come up to any one of those minimum standards. The physical tests proposed, even if fully carried out, would not insure the results desired. Walking six miles an hour, for instance, was a feat which required a certain knack rather than great powers of physical endurance, and a man might fail in it who could cover his 30 miles without fatigue. Then there were practical difficulties in the execution of the scheme which had, probably, not been sufficiently considered by the Members of the Committee and many schoolmasters who had given their approval to this scheme. Where was this jumping and running to take place? It would, of necessity, be private; but it would, at the same time, require a place like the Agricultural Hall or the Lillie Bridge Grounds, to be carried out in; and some 300 or 400 young men running and jumping after their commissions would form, to say the least of it, an extraordinary spectacle. Again, were these tests to come in at the preliminary, or at the final, examination? If at the former, something like 800 candidates would be engaged in these athletic contests, and a considerable organization would be necessary; but, if at the latter, then the literary examination might have the effect of weeding out those who physically were the most effective. The scheme, in fact, did not appear to be a well-considered or practical one, and it was condemned by no less an authority than Sir John Adye, than whom it would be difficult to find a better judge of the moral and physical qualities requisite in candidates for the Service. Such a protest ought to carry weight as against the opinion of the schoolmasters, who, by the way, were not unanimously in favour of them. If the proposed change were made, it was clear that the success of candidates under the system would depend not so much on their constitutional powers as on the particular state of "training" in which they happened to be when they presented themselves. He ventured to think that such tests would fail to produce the kind of officer required. They would even, he believed, be seriously prejudicial to the young men who engaged in them, as it was a notorious fact that severe physical exertions by young men at the age of 17 years caused great harm in after years. Moreover, the Government, by sanctioning them, would appear to affix a stamp upon the system of athletic competitions, which was already too prominent in schools, and so, indirectly, do mischief. If it could be shown that the physique of the Service had deteriorated, something, of course, would have to be done; but he was assured by those who had the best means of judging that we never had a finer lot of young men at Sandhurst and Woolwich than at this time, both as regarded physical and moral qualities. Then why, after considering the average good resulting from the present system, should they change it? The system gave a very good class of men—men of excellent intelligence—and under the present condition of warfare it was most important to have men of good intelligence. They were subject to a sort of natural selection, for weakly youths naturally shunned the Army, with its physical hardships, and they were not too strictly weeded by the examination process. The puny bookworm was not a man likely to seek a military career, and, therefore, there was no danger of any such finding their way into the Army. The examination for the Army was a test of good average intelligence—a quality very essential in modern warfare; it could scarcely be described as of a very high intellectual standard, and candidates once admitted to Woolwich or Sandhurst obtained an admirable physical training. He was assured that they were thoroughly practised in riding and other manly sports, which, it was hardly necessary to say, were a totally different thing from the competitive tests now proposed. He hoped the noble Earl, after what had been said, would be satisfied that the working out of the details of the scheme recommended by the Committee would be attended with so much difficulty as to render it almost impossible. It would be an undesirable scheme, and absolutely unnecessary. He also hoped his noble Friend would be satisfied with that answer, and not bring forward the question again, inasmuch as such discussions tended to unsettle the public mind and to make candidates uncertain as to what subjects they would be expected to learn.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, that he had really nothing to add to what he said in February, 1879, when he spoke of the physical advantages possessed by the young officers in the Army. He entirely denied that there was any physical deterioration on the part of the cadets of Woolwich or Sandhurst to justify the change proposed. He admitted there would be great advantage in the physical requirements which the noble Earl (Earl Fortescue) wished to introduce; but, at the same time, he (the Duke of Cambridge) must point out that they were at present a remarkably fine body of young men, and they had ample opportunity, both at Woolwich and Sandhurst, of improving those physical qualities most required by their Profession. If our officers were deteriorated in this respect, and were, in consequence, not competent to perform their duties properly, those in authority would be desirous of making a change; but he denied that there was any such necessity at present. He would be glad if noble Lords would go down to Woolwich and see the cadets there, and he felt sure that they would be struck when they observed what a fine body of young men presented themselves. There might be some individuals among them of somewhat small stature; but he could assure their Lordships that most of them were 6 feet high. Of course, their appearance on the whole might be better, if some of them were not lower in stature than others. We gave them every opportunity of learning to ride, and the way in which they performed their exercises in the gymnasium was as good as anyone could possibly wish. With all this evidence before them, what more did they want? Why introduce a system which would be attended with great difficulty and inconvenience, and of which the results would be doubtful, for if it were carried out, it must place some young men at a serious disadvantage. No one said that the country was suffering from want of a good class of officers; he therefore hoped that this subject would not be brought forward again, for he did not see that the class of officers who were now obtained and who, it should be remembered, passed a strict medical examination, left anything to be desired. There were usually 700 or 800 candidates for 100 vacancies, and the competition was, consequently, very great. He did not, however, think that their Lordships would wish to see fewer candidates presenting themselves for examination; for the fact that they presented themselves in such numbers showed that the Service was popular, that the spirit of the nation was good, and that there were a great many young men who desired to exhibit their gallantry in the field, as well as to display their good conduct in quarters. He could not, therefore, regret that there was so large a number of candidates for so small a number of vacancies. He did not, moreover, think that anything ought to be done at present to change the system as it existed. It was, he believed, as satisfactory as it could be made; and although he was as much opposed as anybody to the system of cramming, he would observe that that necessity had not been created by the authorities, but rather by the number of competitors. He did not know that he could add anything to the answer which had been given by his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State, and he fully endorsed the arguments which he had laid before the House.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that, as he had an opportunity of going into this subject last year, he would not occupy the attention of their Lordships long. The reason why he rose was because the noble Earl (Earl Fortescue) said that in Parliamentary Motions there was nothing like perseverance if you wished to obtain success, and by that he supposed the noble Earl intended to bring forward this matter again; but he quite agreed with the noble Viscount (Viscount Enfield)

at the head of the Civil Service Commission that it was extremely undesirable that any doubt should exist on the part of those who had to carry out the instruction of young officers, or on the part of the parents of those officers, or that the belief should gain ground that changes of a radical description were about to be introduced into the system of education for the Army. He, therefore, deprecated the bringing forward annually of such a Motion as the present by the noble Earl; and it was clear, in his opinion, that on both sides of the House it was not regarded as being practicable. In the speech of the noble Earl who opened the discussion there was, it appeared to him, an entire absence of any argument to show that the physical tests which he proposed were necessary in consequence of any deterioration in the personnel of young officers; and, if he might say so without disrespect to the noble Earl, it was much more a crotchet than a reality. His (Viscount Bury's) noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War said he did not know at what period the physical test should be applied. Obviously, however, if it was deemed expedient to have recourse to such tests, they must be introduced at the very outset, and must form part of the medical examination; for public opinion would not sanction the proposal that they should be allowed to interfere with the intellectual tests. In that case, they would then find many difficulties in the way, and that they would not be supported by public opinion when they attempted to enforce it. It should also be borne in mind that there were 700 or 800 candidates coming up at every examination, and if the whole 800 were to be examined as suggested, it would be reducing, in his opinion, the whole system to a perfect absurdity. These young men came up to town at very considerable inconvenience to be examined, and if the time during which they were left about London was prolonged in order to carry into effect the proposed tests, then an extremely unfair tax would for insufficient reasons be imposed on their parents. He, therefore, agreed with his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State in deprecating the making of any change in the physical examination for the Army.

LORD HYLTON, after a careful perusal of the Report of the Committee, was of opinion that the arguments opposed to a change outweighed those in favour of it. It would only protract the unreasonably long examination which young men now had to undergo. It was not so much, he thought, physical examination which was required as a reform in the mode of the examinations which were now carried on. At present, a number of young men were brought up from all parts of the United Kingdom, and literally cast adrift in London for more than three weeks; and he had no hesitation in saying, from his own knowledge, that many had failed to pass their examinations in consequence of the temptations to which they had been exposed while in London. If the examinations for admission to Sandhurst or Woolwich could be held at either of those places, it would, he believed, be a great advantage. If the staff at those Establishments was not sufficient, let it be increased; if more buildings were required, let them be built. He appealed to the Government—especially to the noble Lord at the head of the Civil Service Commission—but, above all, he appealed to the Commander-in-Chief, to assist in devising some plan to change a system which, as now carried out, was detrimental to the Service and to the country.

EARL FORTESCUE rose to reply, but—

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON interposed on the ground of Order. There was, he said, no Motion before the House, and their Lordships had already listened to the noble Earl with great indulgence. Beyond that, what had been said on the subject by the noble Earl had been fully answered by the noble Earl on the Treasury Bench (the Earl of Morley).

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)— EJECTMENTS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY, in moving—

“That there be laid before the House, Return in tabular form for each county, of the number of civil bill ejectments, distinguishing ejectments on the title from those for non-payment of rent, tried and determined in each county in Ireland for each of the three years ending 30th June 1880, exclusive of ejectments for premises situate in counties of cities, boroughs, and towns, under the Act 9th Geo. IV. chap. 82., or the Towns Improvement Act, 1854, or any local Act; also the number of persons re-admitted as tenants or care-takers:—Ejectments entered: on title; for non-payment of rent: decrees granted: decrees executed: dismisses: cases otherwise disposed of; stay put on decrees: re-admitted as tenants or care-takers.

“Also, Return, in tubular form for each county, of the number of actions of ejectments in superior courts commenced, distinguishing ejectments on the title from ejectments for non-payment of rent, and those tried and determined in each county in Ireland for each of the three years ending 30th June 1880; and the number of haberes issued and the number executed in the same period; also, number of persons re-admitted as tenants or care-takers:—Actions commenced: on title; for non-payment of rent: actions tried: on title; for rent: number of haberes issued: number of haberes executed: re-admitted as tenants or care-takers.”

“And also, Return for each county for the three years ending 30th June 1880, of the number of land claims in which the court certified under section 9. of the Land Act, that the non-payment of rent causing the eviction had arisen from the rent being an exorbitant rent; and of the amount awarded in each case for disturbance;”

said, Her Majesty's Government, with a view of relieving the distress in Ireland, had introduced a Bill which had for its object to release the tenant farmers of Ireland from the necessity of paying the debts owing to their creditors. A Return had been given by the Crown of the number of evictions that had taken place in Ireland, which stated that in 1877 there were 900 evictions, whilst last year there were 2,063. Those figures, however, were obtained from the Constabulary Force in Ireland; at least, it had been so stated in “another place,” and he (the Earl of Annesley) thought it was very doubtful, indeed, whether those Reports were to be relied upon. However that might be, he said that he did not believe that the landlords in Ireland ever did evict except under great provocation, and for their own protection. If there really had been 918 more evictions last year than in the preceding 12 months, the cause for such a state of things must be looked for in the baneful and unscrupulous agitation at present continuing in Ireland. He thought any noble Lord acquainted with the management of estates in Ireland would agree with him in saying that the large estates in Ireland were managed upon just principles towards the tenants. It was impossible to imagine that any landlord would attempt to evict a tenant in the Ulster Tenant Right district, because he would have to pay an enormous sum for doing so; and, therefore, a landlord would not try, except in a case of absolute necessity. The Return which he asked for was very nearly the same as one which was ordered to be printed by the late House of Commons, and which he believed was now in course of preparation. He thought if the Return was granted, the public would have an opportunity of finding out the real state of the case.

EARL SPENCER said, the Return which the noble Earl (the Earl of Annesley) moved for was almost identical with a Return which was moved for by Mr. Lowther, when he was Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in March last. That Return would be in the hands of Parliament next week, and would give all the information asked for by the noble Earl, except the last portion, which asked for the number re-admitted as tenants or care-takers. He hoped that his noble Friend would be satisfied with the Return moved for by Mr. Lowther; and, if he desired, he (Earl Spencer) had no objection to the Return being made up to the 30th June of this year.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY expressed himself satisfied to accept the Return in the form suggested by the noble Earl (Earl Spencer).

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

(NO. 106.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL SPENCER, in moving that the Bill be now the second time, said, that it did not introduce any new principle, but was merely intended to carry out what the Act of 1870 first began. That Bill was extended by the Act of 1876. He did not, therefore, think it necessary to trouble their Lordships with any general statement, and he trusted that the Bill would not meet with any opposition from their Lordships. Briefly, the object of the Bill was to enforce school attendance throughout the country. He wished to point out what had been done under the former Education Acts. First, there was the Act of 1870, under which there was no obligation on parents to send their children to school; but bye-laws were allowed to be made in places where there were school boards, under which parents might be prosecuted for not sending their children to school. Secondly, there was the Act of 1876, which was introduced into the other House by Lord Sandon, and into their Lordships' House by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), his Predecessor. That Act contained some important clauses with regard to education, which materially altered the measure of 1870. One clause enacted that there should be an obligation on every parent in England and Wales to have his child educated. There was a further enactment making it penal on the part of every employer of labour to employ children under the age of 10 years; and only at the age of 14 was a child able to claim certain exemptions. Those exemptions were to be earned. The rules under this head gradually increased in stringency, and the maximum of stringency would be reached in January, 1881, when, by the Act of 1876, no child could be employed up to the age of 14, unless he had passed the 4th Standard, or had attended school 250 times a-year on the average during five years; and the child must not have attended in more than two schools. There was also a general enactment by which bye-laws might be made for the purpose of regulating the attendance of children in every district, and varying according to the necessities of each district. There was a third mode of exemption under the Factory Acts, which were thoroughly revised in 1876. Under those Acts no child could be employed up to the age of 10 years. If he was employed after that age, he must go to school half-time up to the age of 13, without a standard being fixed. At that age, if he passed the 4th Standard, he could go to work. These were the general regulations so far as regarded compulsory education. Then there was one clause in the Act of 1876—the 11th clause—which enacted that any person convicted by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction of habitual neglect to send his children to school should be liable to punishment. That Act also contained an important Amendment with regard to bye-laws. Up to that time bye-laws could only be enforced where there were school boards. But the Act contained a provision that a school attendance committee, formed by the urban and rural authorities, in parishes and places where there was no school board, on the requisition of any parish, should have the same power of making bye-laws as the school boards. Those were the general regulations, and that was the machinery for enforcing those regulations; but they were somewhat defective. Up to 1876 there were two laws in different districts. In one district parents might be under compulsion owing to the existence of bye-laws, and in another there might be no compulsion because there were no bye-laws. But the question of bye-laws was somewhat difficult, because it was necessary, when there were no bye-laws, that there should first be a requisition from a parish. A school board had to be appointed, or the ratepayers had to sign a requisition. That caused a great difficulty, because at least 50 persons had to sign the requisition, and the farmers were not always fully alive to the form of proceeding, and were also reluctant to incur any expenditure for carrying out a proposal which might break down. The cost was considerable. For instance, the cost of obtaining these bye-laws reached in some Unions the sum of £100. The Bill before their Lordships professed to deal with that question in a simple manner. It was no longer to be necessary to get a requisition signed; but the school attendance committee was to be empowered to make bye-laws, and the Act required that before the end of this year all the school attendance committees should do so. He next wished to point out the number of schools in the country, and the number of children attending those schools. The total of schools in 1869-70 was 8,281; in 1875-76, 14,273; and in 1878-9, 17,166. In those schools there was accommodation for 2,000,000 children in 1869-70, for 3,500,000 in 1875-6, and for upwards of 4,000,000 in 1878-9. The percentage of the population attending those schools was, in 1869-70, 8.75; in 1875-6, 14.13; and in 1878-9, 16.46. That showed a satisfactory state of things. The country had now arrived at something like what was thought to be by those who had entered into calculations on the subject the goal of its endeavours. Then he would refer to the Register. The number on the Register in 1869-70, was

1,600,000; in 1875-6, nearly 3,000,000; and in 1878-9, 3,710,000. Then with respect to the percentage of average attendance, as compared with the numbers on the books, he found that in 1869 the percentage was 67; in 1875-6 it was 68; and in 1878-9, 70; so that not only was the number of children attending school steadily increasing, but the percentage of attendance by the children on the books was increasing in equal proportion. This showed that compulsion had had a desirable effect. In the first six years the attendance had increased at the rate of 200,000, and in the last three years at the rate of 250,000. If they looked at the population of 5,580,000 who were not under bye-laws, they would find that 5,000,000 belonged to rural parishes. The difficulty of enforcing compulsion under the general Statute upon obstinate parents was that, in the first instance, an attendance order was made, and if a penalty were desired, it was necessary to return and show that the attendance order had been disobeyed. Two motions were necessary before any practical action could be taken. Under the bye-laws it was found that the process was simpler and cheaper. Although there had been a gradual progress in school attendance, something further was necessary, and he proposed by this Bill, by extending the operations of the bye-laws, to carry on the work of the Act of 1870, which the Act of 1876 so materially assisted; and if they got the bye-laws now proposed passed, they would be doing quite as much as they could. The reason why he introduced the Bill was this. In 1881, the Act of 1876 would attain its greatest stringency. It would be illegal next year for any person to employ a child at half-time even up to the age of 14, unless that child had passed in the 4th Standard. He was afraid it would be exceedingly difficult in many districts to employ children under these conditions. He found that last year, out of 889,271 children above the age of 10, there were 506,820 presented in Standards 1, 2, and 3. That showed that there had been considerable difficulty in obtaining so high a standard as was desired. It was, besides, exceedingly difficult, if not almost impossible, from the removal of the residence of the parents, and other causes, to get a certain number of attendances shown. What would be the result in 1881? He believed the Act would be evaded, as it was now evaded, by a large class, or it would sweep to a great extent many fields and places of children who ought to be doing work and bringing wages to their parents. They should require every school board throughout the country to pass bye-laws which would meet the requirements of the neighbourhood; and if the boards did not pass bye-laws, bye-laws should be passed for them; and it was hoped that by January they would have bye-laws which would obviate the great hardships of taking from labour a great many of the children of the country. The second part of the Bill dealt with a conflict of authority which had occurred between the bye-laws and the Factory Acts, and two cases had been tried in order to see which was paramount. At present, one employer of labour—namely, the manufacturer, found he could get his labour without any difficulty under the Factory Acts, which allowed children of 10 years of age to go to work as half-timers; while the farmer could not get a boy, because the bye-laws under which the boy was bound to be so employed were very much more severe in their application than the Acts in question, for they required that children so employed should have passed a certain standard. The Judges before whom one of the cases was tried (Justices Bramwell and Denman) decided that the bye-laws were paramount; but in the other case, tried by Justices Mellor and Lush, the decision was exactly the reverse. No appeal could be made, as it was a criminal matter, and therefore they had come to a deadlock. The Government proposed where there was a conflict of this kind that the bye-laws should prevail, for it had been shown that having to pass a standard was a great stimulus to parents to send their children to school, and it was thought desirable to place all children under the same law. There was also power in the Bill to give the power of deciding to the school board to say whether the school should be under the bye-laws or the general Act, as it was desired to give, in the matter of school attendance, the option to school boards, and not to the magistrate or the Judge, to direct a prosecution. There was one clause—the 40th—in the Act of 1876, which imposed some very remarkable and unfair conditions upon pauper children. For instance, if a man met with an accident and applied for out-door relief to the Union, his children must go to school unless they fulfilled certain conditions—that was, reached the 3rd Standard; and, therefore, a child who had fully earned exemption from school, was required to go back to school at the very time his services were most required. He did not think that that was the intention of the Act. Therefore, under the present Bill, it was proposed that whenever a child had earned exemption he should not, because his father became a pauper, have to go to school and to fulfil other conditions. Those were the provisions of the Bill, and they would, he was convinced, operate with great advantage. The noble Earl concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."
—(The Lord President.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he did not in any way deprecate the advancement of education; but he thought that great discretion should be given to magistrates in cases under the Education Act. Parents often lost much time and had much difficulty in getting truant children to go to school. He (the Duke of Somerset) had known of cases in which, when boys were told to go to school, they went bird's-nesting; and unless the father lost his time in looking after them and seeing that they went regularly to school, he would be liable to be punished, and magistrates were sometimes very severe on poor parents in such circumstances. Again, a poor widow who had to go out to work, if she was obliged to follow her children every day to school, would be unable to earn her living. He admitted that there must be compulsion; but he thought it should be adopted gradually and with due regard to circumstances. In his opinion, magistrates ought to have some power of relaxing the rigour of the principle in cases such as he had suggested.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could assure his noble Friend the President of the Council (Earl Spencer) that this measure had his most cordial support. He thought his noble Friend would not be surprised at that intimation, because he believed this was much the same Bill as the one which he (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had himself intended to introduce if circumstances had not prevented his doing so. He did not gather that the noble Duke who had just spoken (the Duke of Somerset) objected to the provisions of the Bill generally, but rather that he desired that there should be some power given to magistrates of relaxing the penalties in certain cases to which parents were liable. At present, however, the magistrates had a great discretion in carrying out the law, and instances of hardship were quite the exception. Magistrates always dealt with the surrounding circumstances of the cases brought before them, and the parents of children who went bird's-nesting when they ought to go to school would not be treated harshly. That Bill was necessary, more especially in the agricultural districts. The only point in it which he did not quite understand was the last part of Clause 4, and when they went into Committee it might be desirable to obtain further information with regard to it.

EARL SPENCER said, he could confirm substantially what had been said by his noble Friend the late President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) in respect to the discretion vested in magistrates, and often exercised by them in cases such as those mentioned by his noble Friend the Duke of Somerset. The signature of two members of the school board was required to any order for proceeding against a parent, and, beyond that, truant children could be committed under certain conditions to industrial schools.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before

QUESTIONS.

SPAIN—DETENTION OF A BRITISH SUBJECT AT FERNANDO PO.

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that Mr. James C. Young, a British subject, was, in June 1878, sentenced to four months imprisonment or £20 fine by the Courts of Fernando Po, and that the fine was paid and its payment accepted, but that Young is still detained a prisoner in the island on the ground that his sentence requires ratification by the Superior Courts at Havannah; whether the climate of Fernando Po is not considered to be one of the most deadly to Europeans in the world; whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps to rescue Mr. Young from an indefinitely protracted imprisonment; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the correspondence relating to Mr. Young's case?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The facts of the case, as stated by the hon. Member, are, I regret to say, correct. Urgent remonstrances on the subject have been repeatedly addressed to the Spanish Government through Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid, special stress being laid on the danger to Mr. Young's life involved in his continued detention at Fernando Po. The latest intelligence received was to the effect that the case was to come before the Supreme Court at Havannah on the 12th ultimo. There will be no objection to laying the Correspondence on the Table of the House?

IRELAND—THE PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN.

MR. M. BROOKS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any spaces in the Phoenix Park hitherto enjoyed by the general public have been recently inclosed and set apart; and, if so, whether such encroachments or inclosures have been sanctioned by the custodians of the Park in the interests of the public?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am not sure, Sir, that this Question ought not to have been asked of the Treasury, as it relates to the Board of Works, which is under the Treasury. All I know about the Phoenix Park is that it is a very beautiful park, and I sometimes wish that I was there instead of here. For some years a portion of it has been inclosed with a wire fence for the purpose of utilizing the sewage of the Royal Hibernian Military School, and for a short time, I understand, an additional wire fence has been put round an additional space. There is no intention of keeping up the wire fence round it, and it is in a portion of the Park which is less frequented than the other portions of it are.

THE CAPE COLONY—SIR BARTLE FRERE.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the failure of the South African Confederation Scheme has altered the view of the Government with regard to the retention of Sir Bartle Frere at the Cape?

MR. GLADSTONE: As I made the fullest statement to the House upon this subject on a previous occasion, it may be convenient that I should make a reply to the Question of the hon. Member. Her Majesty's Government have received with very great concern the intelligence which has arrived from the Cape, showing that the proposals of the Cape Ministry for the promotion of Confederation among the Colonies have been frustrated. I am aware that that fact has a serious bearing upon the statement I addressed to the House on an early day of this Session; but it is not possible for the Government, from the succinct telegraphic notices that have arrived, to form any sufficient and comprehensive judgment on the circumstances, and, consequently, I cannot at present answer my hon. Friend; but when the despatches giving a clear and full account of the occurrences have arrived, the matter will have our full and serious consideration.

Mr. M. Brooks

RAILWAYS (IRELAND)—LIMERICK JUNCTION.

MR. A. MOORE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is a fact that, owing to monetary differences between the Great Southern and Western and Limerick and Waterford Railways as to the terms of occupation and use of the station at Limerick Junction, the latter Company have received notice to quit and are now engaged in constructing a station on their own land some five hundred or six hundred yards from the existing station; and, whether, as this is the most important centre of Railway communication in the South of Ireland, and that by the proposed arrangements very great inconvenience will be caused to the public, attended, probably, with delays in the transmission of mails and parcels, the Board of Trade will take steps, by arbitration or otherwise, to protect the public from such grave annoyance?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The Board of Trade have no official knowledge of the circumstances referred to in the Question of my hon. Friend, and, as no question of public safety appears to be involved, they would have no power to interfere unless appealed to by both of the Railway Companies interested. Should the Companies apply to the Board of Trade, I shall be happy to direct steps to be at once taken in order to bring the differences which are alleged to exist to a satisfactory termination.

THE CURRENCY—WORN GOLD COINS.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the condition of the gold currency; and, whether it is proposed to take steps to withdraw from circulation worn coins which are below the current weight?

MR. GLADSTONE: My attention, Sir, has been called to the condition of the gold currency, and I am aware that it is unsatisfactory. But my hon. Friend will know that the question is a very serious one, and that it entails consequences which might not appear at first sight to belong to it. It entails a consideration of the whole question as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the premises of the present Mint, and the amount of work which the Mint can carry on; and, further, whether it is practicable or desirable to delegate to private persons the conduct of any portion of our currency—for, without that, the gold coinage could not be renewed, as I am informed, at the present time. If that delegation could not take place, there then comes up the question of the removal of the site of the Mint. Under these circumstances, I think my hon. Friend will not regard me as unreasonable when I say that, while I feel the subject will require early attention, I do not think it will be possible to give it that consideration during the continuance of the present Session.

TURKEY—THE IDENTIC NOTE—MR. GOSCHEN'S MISSION.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the identic note said to have been presented to the Porte, as well as the reply to that note, can be laid before Parliament; and, whether any other Papers connected with Mr. Goschen's Mission can be laid before Parliament?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Identic Note and Papers relating to it will be presented to Parliament as soon as circumstances will admit of this being done without interfering with the progress of negotiations. We shall have to obtain the concurrence of the other Powers concerned.

CUSTOMS AND INLAND REVENUE—THE WINE DUTIES.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any communications have been received from any Foreign Government other than that of France, upon the subject of the proposed alteration in the Wine Duties; and, if so, whether they can be produced?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Government are in communication with the Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, and Austrian Governments on the subject of the Wine Duties; but it would be inconvenient to lay any of the Papers before the House at the present stage of the negotiations. Representations from most of the foreign Powers concerned in the matter will be found in a Memorandum drawn up in the Foreign Office, and appended to the Report of the Select Committee of this House on the Wine Duties in 1879.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS—WICKLOW ELECTION—THE BALLOT.

MR. M'COAN asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether Mr. Fenton, the land agent of Mr. Fitzwilliam Dick, an unsuccessful candidate at the late election for Wicklow, who, having been admitted under an order of the Irish Court of Common Pleas, to inspect the ballot papers of the said election in support of a petition (since withdrawn) against one of the sitting Members, has since, for the purpose of intimidating voters, publicly declared that he had, during such inspection, discovered how they had voted, has not, by such public declaration, rendered himself liable to a criminal prosecution under the Ballot Act; and, if so, whether he will, on being supplied with circumstantial information as to the facts, direct that the law be so enforced?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): I have myself no information as to the facts stated or implied in the Question of the hon. Member; but if it is to be understood that the gentleman referred to has, for the purpose of intimidating voters, threatened them with any injury because of their having voted, he has committed the offence of undue influence, and is liable to a prosecution, not under the Ballot Act, but under the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act. As to the last part of the Question, I can only say that if the facts of the case should come before me on sworn informations in the usual way, it will be my duty to consider whether a prosecution can be sustained.

INDIA—BEHAR.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to a pamphlet entitled "The Ruin of an Indian Province," signed "Charles James O'Donnell, Justice of the Peace for the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa," and which ascribes the periodical famines and general poverty of Behar not to any natural or unavoidable causes, but to the rack-renting of their tenantry by the landlords, the mismanagement by the Government as Court of Wards of certain vast estates, and the eviction and oppression of the farmers by European adventurers for the purpose of indigo planting, "often with the support of officials of the highest local position;" and, whether he will cause any inquiry to be made into the accuracy of the statements on which the author of the pamphlet bases the grave accusations it contains?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: My attention has been called to, and I have read, this pamphlet. It relates, in the main, to alleged oppression of ryots by proprietors and indigo planters through abuse of the law relating to the levy of rent. This is a subject which has for a long time occupied the attention of the Government of India, and legislation has frequently been proposed to remedy evils that are admitted. The subject is at present under the consideration of a Select Committee, whose Report is almost immediately expected, and, no doubt, it will be followed by legislation. The pamphlet, however, contains allegations of so grave a character, not only as against the state of the law, but also as regards the conduct of the administration of these Provinces, that I shall certainly consider it necessary, as soon as I am able, to satisfy myself as to the nature of the evidence on which those allegations rest. But until I have had that opportunity, I am not prepared to say that I shall consider it necessary to order any investigation to be made in India.

AFGHANISTAN — MR. LEPEL GRIFFIN.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether there is any truth in the report that Mr. Lepel Griffin has been ordered from Cabul to Simla; what arrangements have been made for the continuance of negotiations with certain Afghan Chiefs during the absence of that officer; and, when he intends to lay upon the Table any further Papers relating to our present position in Afghanistan?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have received no intimation to the effect that Mr. Griffin has been summoned to Simla. If, however, it is the case, General Sir Donald Stewart, who has the supreme political as well as military command at Cabul, would be fully competent to continue the negotiations going on with the Afghan Chiefs. With regard to the latter part of the Question, I do not think, in the present state of the negotiations, that it would be possible for me to lay on the Table of the House anything which would add to the information of the House; but I will take care to lay on the Table such Papers as I am able at the earliest possible moment.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS — THE BEWDLEY ELECTION PETITION.

MR. LEA asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been drawn to the Report of the Bewdley Election Petition, in which Mr. Justice Denman and Mr. Justice Lopes have unseated Mr. Charles Harrison because a friend's bailiff had lent a voter a drill without charge for hire, and because two working men had made an arrangement about one land club share; both so-called bribers having contradicted the statements made, also all the charges of bribery and treating having completely failed, and the ground of agency being that these two persons were members of the Liberal Association; and, if he will consider in what way the Law may be speedily amended?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, the evidence taken on the trial of the Bewdley Election Petition had not yet been printed and presented to the House, and, therefore, his attention had not yet been called to the case to which his hon. Friend referred. He imagined, however, from the wording of the Question, that it was sought to gain from him an opinion as to the justice of the decision of the learned Judges who tried the Petition. His hon. Friend and the House would, perhaps, excuse him if he declined to go into a question put in that shape. It often happened that there would be apparent hardship in a strict interpretation of the law of agency; but he could only answer the Question put to him as to an alteration of the law categorically by saying that he saw no opportunity of speedily amending the law in this respect.

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

ARMY—NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

COLONEL OWEN WILLIAMS asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is not an acknowledged fact that very serious deterioration has taken place amongst the Non-Commissioned Officers of the regiments of the Line; whether he has any evidence before him which tends to show that this deterioration is the result of Lord Cardwell's re-organisation scheme of 1871; and, whether, having regard to the great exigence of the case, Her Majesty's Government contemplate taking immediate measures to remedy the existing state of affairs; and, if so, when will these remedial measures come into operation?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. and gallant Member, I must distinctly decline to admit the allegation that it is an acknowledged fact that very serious deterioration has taken place among the non-commissioned officers of the regiments of the Line, or that this is the result of Lord Cardwell's Re-organization Scheme of 1871. In many respects the non-commissioned officers of the Line have improved since 1871. They are better educated, as shown by the last general annual Return presented to Parliament; and I find that as to punishment the number reduced to the ranks is less. But they are, on the average, made non-commissioned officers at a younger age than in 1871; and in the opinion of many commanding officers some of them have in consequence not sufficient experience. It is also alleged that greater difficulty than formerly is found in retaining their services, although I find that 71 per cent of the sergeants who completed six years' service in 1879 elected to continue with the Colours. Under these circumstances, although questions affecting the non-commissioned officers are intimately connected with the general question of the organization of the Army, which we shall have to consider on the Report of Lord Airey's Committee, I have arrived at the conclusion that this is the most pressing branch of the subject, and we shall take it up without delay. Perhaps I may add that both the German and French Military Department are experiencing the same difficulties as ourselves with respect to non-commissioned officers, although their Armies are recruited in a very different way, and the problem in the face of social circumstances of the present day appears to be a very difficult one throughout Europe. I cannot name any particular date for proceeding in this matter, which is one of 80 or 100 most important questions that I found on assuming Office had to be dealt with.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is intended to regulate the superannuation of the Customs officials, in accordance with the system now carried out at the Admiralty, as to the compulsory retirement of men 65 years of age, with 40 years service who have obtained the maximum salary of their position?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: There is no general rule providing for compulsory retirement from the Customs Service at any given age, and no general proposition has been made of the nature suggested by my hon. and learned Friend. But certain clerks who, after the late re-organization, remain redundant until vacancies occur for them in the superior part of the Establishment, have been permitted, in addition to this improved prospect, to rise in the meantime to salaries in excess of the maximum salary of the classes in which they stood previously to the re-organization, subject to the condition (inter alia), that on completing the 60th year of their age they should retire with pension unless the Board of Customs should recommend their continuance for special reasons and the Treasury give their consent. I hope my hon. Friend will forgive me for repeating what I stated in reply to a Question a short time ago—that it is most prejudicial to the efficiency and discipline of this great Service, and renders changes in it next to impossible, that the attention of this House should, without the gravest reasons, be invited so frequently as has been the case in recent years to matters of executive detail in connection with it.

GREECE—GUARANTEED LOAN OF 1832-3.

MR. GRANTHAM asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether this Country is by Treaty or other obligations under any pecuniary liability to Greece or to the creditors of Greece; and, if so, to what extent?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: This country is under no pecuniary liability to Greece at the present moment. The final payment in respect of the portion of the Greek Loan guaranteed by Great Britain was made in 1871. Full details on the subject will be found in the Return presented to Parliament on the 14th of February last (No. 40).

BARBADOES.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Rule 75 of the Colonial Regulations relative to the tenure of public offices apply to, and are enforced in, all the judicial and fiscal appointments in the Island of Barbadoes?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that the case of Barbadoes, which is very exceptional, is covered by the words "generally speaking" in that Regulation. I may mention that the chief fiscal officer in Barbadoes, although confirmed by the Governor, is appointed annually by the Assembly.

ARMY (INDIA)—CASE OF MR. F. G. C.
SHAW.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for India, If, after considering all the Correspondence, including the Minute of Sir N. Chamberlain, which has passed concerning Mr. F. G. C. Shaw, Senior Veterinary Surgeon of the Madras Army, he will cause any steps to be taken to redress the grievances complained of by that gentleman?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that the case of Mr. Shaw had been decided upon by the Government of India and by his Predecessor, Lord Cranbrook. He had not been able to read all the Correspondence and examine it himself; and until he had an opportunity of doing so, he could hold out no hopes of a reversal of the decision.

CRIMINAL LAW—POACHING IN HAWARDEN PARK.

MR. ONSLOW: I rise to a point of Order. I gave Notice of a Question publicly in my place in the House the other night, and I find that in the form in which it appears upon the Paper there is an omission in it. If what is omitted was irregular, I bow at once to the decision of the Chair; but I wish, Sir, to know if the omission has been made by your authority, or by the Clerk at the Table? If it has been done by the Clerk at the Table I think it is wrong, because no hon. Member ought to be at the mercy of the Clerks at the Table, and to have their Question altered without notice to the hon. Member. When I gave Notice of the Question the name of a right hon. Gentleman was upon it, and I want to know whether it is competent or not for an hon. Member to include in a Notice of a Question the name of an individual Member? I may point out that in the Votes for to-night the name of Mr. Fitzwilliam Dick is inserted in Question No. 10, and in No. 14 the names of Mr. Justice Denman and Mr. Justice Lopes are included. I wish to ask you, Sir, if it is competent for an hon. Member in this House to insert in a Question the name of any Member of this House or of any individual outside this House, or whether the omission in this instance was done by your authority, or only on the authority of one of the Clerks at the Table?

MR. SPEAKER: The alteration referred to in the Question has been made by the Clerk at the Table under my general authority, according to the uniform practice of the House when the names of individuals are introduced into Questions. Those names do not appear upon the Paper, unless they are necessary to make the Question plain. That has been the practice hitherto pursued. No doubt, in this case, the name was omitted because it was thought unnecessary. The introduction of a name appeared to be of an invidious character, and, on that ground, the correction was made.

MR. ONSLOW, after that explanation, begged to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a conviction by the Flintshire Magistrates, at the Mold Petty Sessions on Monday last, of three men named Richard Williams, Joseph Taylor, and Robert Pierce, residing in the parish of Hawarden, for poaching in Hawarden Park; and to the evidence given by three keepers, Herbert Hirst, Henry Hirst, and Joseph Fennah, which showed that the only game found in the possession of the prisoners was 10 rabbits; and, if he considers the penalty of two months' imprisonment with hard labour excessive; and, if so, whether he will take steps to mitigate the sentence?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: My attention has been called to this case by the Question of the hon. Member. I had not heard of it before. I presume the hon. Member was not aware that this was a case of night poaching, accompanied with violence, or, no doubt, he would have stated it in his Question. The three prisoners were taken after 1 o'clock in the morning. They resisted, and struck the keepers on the head. They were all old offenders, and had been previously convicted. The first man, Richard Williams, was convicted in 1873, under the Poaching Prevention Act, and fined 20s.; in 1874 he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment for rescuing a Militiaman at Mold; and in the same year he received 14 days' imprisonment for larceny. Again, in 1877, he was convicted under the Poaching Prevention Act, and fined 20s., and 10s. for assaulting the police; in 1878 he had three months' hard labour for night poaching. Joseph Taylor was convicted in 1877, under the Poaching Prevention Act, and fined 20s. for that offence, and 20s. for assaulting the police. In 1878 he was again convicted several times for poaching. That is the history of Joseph Taylor; but as to Robert Pierce, he was convicted in 1877, and fined 40s. for poaching, there being several previous convictions for poaching against him; and, in addition, he has received a sentence of three months' imprisonment for felony. The magistrates say that they had some doubt whether it was not their duty to have dealt with the prisoners more severely, as their characters were so bad; but, as the conviction was under a different Act, they preferred to deal with the case as a first offence, and to inflict the mitigated penalty, which is, for a first offence, three months' hard labour; for a second, six months' hard labour; and for night poaching, with violence, which was the case here, two years' hard labour. I need hardly say that, under these circumstances, I have no intention of interfering with the judgment of the magistrates.

STATE OF IRELAND — EVICTIONS AT BALLYDUFF—THE CONSTABULARY.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a special force of constabulary has been despatched to Ballyduff in Kerry; if so, what reasons exist for their being so despatched; and, whether the cost of their maintenance, or any part of it, will be charged on the locality?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am informed that on the 8th of last May the County Inspector of Kerry reported to the Inspector General of Constabulary that, in consequence of evictions at Ballyduff, there appeared to be on the part of the people a combination to resist evictions and intimidate the officers of the law. He recommended the temporary re-establishment of the police station at Ballyduff. The barracks has been accordingly temporarily occupied by a constable and four men. I think the Constabulary authorities did perfectly right in giving the protection they did; but, as the force was supplied by the county, no special charge has been made for the expenditure.

INLAND REVENUE — MALTSTERS' LICENCES.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is aware that the Board of Inland Revenue are demanding payment of the maltsters' licences in July; and, if so, whether he will give instructions that they should be remitted, as they must cease on the 1st of October, and are taken out for one year?

MR. GLADSTONE: I believe the Board of Inland Revenue are only doing their strict and imperative duty in requiring those maltsters who intend to make malt between the 1st of July and the 30th of September to take out licences. Should the law pass by which an end will be put to the Malt Tax, three-fourths of the amount so paid will be returned.

NAVY—THE NAVAL RESERVES.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the Report of Admiral Phillimore on the Naval Reserves, in which he states that there has, within the last few years, been a considerable falling off in the number of the Coast Guard "owing to the lack of candidates;" and, whether, in the opinion of the Admiralty, this lack of candidates is in any degree due to the fact that the pay and pensions of the men and officers has lately suffered a diminution as compared with those of similar rank in the Navy?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The attention of the Admiralty has been directed to the passage in the Report of Admiral Phillimore quoted by the hon. and gallant Member; but I find that at the present moment the number of men in the Coastguard is only 56 below the number actually voted—namely, 4,000, and the Admiralty are not in fear of a want of candidates for the Service sufficient to maintain this number. The pay and pensions of the Coastguard have not been reduced of late, but the pay has not been increased relatively to the pay of the seamen in the Fleet; but a large number of men give up the position of petty officers in the Fleet in order to enter the Coastguard in inferior grades; it is clear, therefore, that the Service is not an unpopular one.

H.M.S. "THUNDERER"—REPORT OF THE HEAVY GUN COMMITTEE.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Report of the Heavy Gun Committee upon the bursting of the second gun of H.M.S. "Thunderer" at Woolwich will be presented?

MR. CHILDERS: The Report of the Heavy Gun Committee has not yet been received at the War Office; but when I have perused it I hope to be able to present it. I understand that it is almost complete.

INDIAN FAMINE COMMISSION—THE FIRST REPORT.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received the first Report of the Indian Famine Commission; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House; and, also, how soon he expects to receive the second and final Report of the Commission?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The first Report has been received and printed, and I hope it will be in the hands of Members in a few days. I have taken steps to hasten the final Report, which I trust will be in the hands of Members in the course of the present month as promised.

TURKEY (FINANCE)—INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose taking any steps to convoke the meeting of an International Commission at Constantinople to consider the financial condition of the Ottoman Empire, with special reference to the claims of the Russian Government and of the holders of bonds of the Ottoman Public Debts?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not think I can give the hon. Member any further information on this subject than is contained in the Instructions to Mr. Goschen, which have been recently laid before the House. It is there stated that—"It may be a question whether the Powers should not call for the appointment of a Financial Commission, such as is indicated in the recommendation recorded in the 18th Protocol of the Berlin Congress."

LAND ACT (IRELAND) 1870—COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If any cases have occurred in which compensation for disturbance has been awarded under section 9 of the Land Act of 1870, on the ground that the rent was an exorbitant rent; and, if many cases have not occurred in which ejectments have been brought against tenants whose rents have exceeded Griffith's Valuation by fifty or even one hundred per cent?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, a Return presented to Parliament in 1878 shows that between the passing of the Land Act and the beginning of the year 1877 no such case occurred. I have no official information; but I rather think there have been one or two cases since. As regards the question of Griffith's valuation, I really can give no answer about that. The hon. Member himself, or any other Member of the House, is as well able as I am to determine as to the subject. I do not think Griffith's valuation is much prized at the present moment as a value for rent. I think, however, I ought to add that as regards the word "exorbitant" no such thing is likely to occur in the stringent legal interpretation of the term.

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)

MR. BAXTER asked the Secretary of State for India, If he has yet received the full information regarding the financial condition of India which he expected first on the 10th of June, and then on the 20th of June, if not, what is the cause of the delay; and, if he has any reason to believe that the deficit is greater than has been stated?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The fuller information promised on the 20th of June has been received. The Papers were immediately placed in the printer's hands. Some further telegraphic correspondence, however, has been going on for the purpose of ascertaining the exact financial position at the present moment. That only came to a close on the 3rd of July, and that will be included in the Papers which will almost immediately be presented. With regard to the latter part of the Question, it is now understood that the excess of the war expenditure over the Estimates in the Financial Statement was £9,000,000; but the greater part has been disbursed from the balances before the 31st of March last, though not brought into account. The excess to be met in the year 1880-81 is now estimated at £3,370,000.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS— CORRUPT PRACTICES AT EVESHAM.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Government intend to institute a prosecution against the voter for Evesham, on account of whose corrupt practices the late election at that borough has been declared void; whether any machinery exists by which that person can be brought to justice; and, whether he will be entitled to vote at the forthcoming election?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): In answer to that portion of the Question of the hon. Gentleman which refers to the institution of a prosecution, I have to say that it is not my intention to advise the Government to take any proceedings against this voter. The duty of the Government, or rather of the Attorney General, with regard to any person convicted of bribery is regulated by the 9th section of the Act of 1863; and if the hon. Gentleman refers to that statute he will find that it seems to be intended that prosecutions should be instituted after the Report of a Commission that extensive bribery had been committed. In answer to the second portion of the Question, I wish to point out that there is now a Public Prosecutor, whose duties are defined by the Act of last Session to be that he shall institute proceedings in any case to which his attention had been called, and in which he thinks proceedings would be justified. In answer to the third portion of the Question, whether this person is entitled to vote at the forthcoming election, it appears that the disqualification exists only when the person has an opportunity of being heard in answer to the charge; and it has been decided by high authority that a person called as a witness is not a person who has had an opportunity of answering a charge.

AFGHANISTAN—REPORTED ACTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it was true, as stated in the Cabul correspondence of The Times, that on the collection in a certain village of a number of Afghan Tribes, General Hill, one of General Roberts's "vigorous-policy" men, despatched a brigade of Cavalry to disperse the gathering, and to give as good an account of them as possible: that the people took to flight, but were pursued for six miles; that 200 were killed, and that one man in particular was killed after laying down his arms and begging for mercy; and whether, if the facts are as reported, the conduct of the officers was not in direct contravention of the orders which the noble Marquess had informed the House had been sent out to India?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have certainly received no information which leads me to think that the account which appears in The Times of this morning is entirely accurate. I will, however, if the hon. Member will give Notice, on another occasion state what information we have relating to the proceedings to which the hon. Member's Question refers.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked what Business would be taken at the Morning Sitting to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE said that, assuming the House divided that evening on the discussion which was the first Order, the Government proposed to go on with the Employers' Liability Bill to-morrow.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked, Whether the Savings Banks Bill would be resumed that evening, or when it would receive the consideration of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had no doubt the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill would occupy the attention of the House all the evening. For the convenience of Members, both of the House and the trade, he might say that he proposed to pass the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill through Committee pro forma, on the assumption that the Notices on the Paper with reference to it would pass over until the time when a real vote was to be taken in the matter.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS, 1869, 1873, AND 1874 (SIR ANDREW JUDD'S SCHOOL AT TONBRIDGE).

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord KENSINGTON) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address of [28th June] as followeth:—

I have received your Address, praying that I will withhold My consent from Section 16 of the Scheme passed under the Endowed Schools Acts, 1869, 1873, and 1874, for the Management of Sir Andrew Judd's School at Tonbridge.

I will withhold My consent from the Section in conformity with your desire.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACTS, 1869, 1873, AND 1874 (SKINNERS' COMPANY'S CHARITIES AT TONBRIDGE).

THE COMPTROLLER OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Lord KENSINGTON) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address of [28th June] as followeth:—

I have received your Address, praying that I will withhold my consent from Section 13 of the Scheme passed under the Endowed Schools Acts,

The Marquess of Hartington

(Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE ON AMENDMENT ON SECOND READING. [25th June.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [25th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now,' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, it was with considerable regret he found himself unable, owing to the late hour at which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland spoke on Tuesday, to offer some reply to his speech. He would remark generally, with respect to that speech, that there was one thing in it which filled him with surprise, and it was the tone of vindictive animosity towards landlords which pervaded the speech from the beginning to the end. He should really have been astonished had it been made by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell); but, coming as it did from one of the most able and respectable members of the Irish Bar, he was filled with considerable dismay. It occurred to him that if that speech faithfully represented the views of the Government, the Bill was not merely a temporary measure for the relief of Irish distress, but it was something widely different—it was the commencement of a campaign against landlords; it was the first step in a social war; it was an attempt to raise the masses against the propertied classes. And in connection with this view there was another feature in that speech which was most remarkable—that although there was going on at present an agitation of the most unmeasured nature on the Land Question, and although language was being used of a very singular kind at meetings which must have given the Attorney General for Ireland grave cause for anxiety and alarm, not a word, not a single syllable, not a hint, even, did the Attorney General give that could afford to the House a suspicion that he deprecated that agitation, or disapproved of that language. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman were to be judged by the promoters of that agitation from his speech, then those promoters had every right and reason to look on the Law Officers of the Crown in Ireland as their sympathizer, friend, and ally. He would leave the legal arguments with which his speech abounded to others who were more acquainted with the subtleties of lawyers than he was; but what the Attorney General said practically amounted to this—The landlords have had £1,250,000 from the State; how could they have the face to object to a measure for the relief of their tenantry? A more ungenerous and misleading argument was never used in the House of Commons. What was the real position? At a most critical period of last year the late Government found themselves compelled to provide employment for the people in such a manner as to avoid the disasters which resulted from their employment upon public works in 1848. They sought the assistance of the Irish landlords, and offered them terms, which were not extravagantly in their favour, in order to secure the employment of the people and the development of the agricultural resources of the country. The landlords throughout the distressed districts came forward and accepted the terms of the Government; and thousands of people had been employed, and were being employed, by means of an outlay for which the landlords had rendered themselves liable. If the landlords had had any suspicion that what they had done would be turned against them in the way it had been by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, the House must not suppose that a sixpence of the loan would have been taken up. What Her Majestys' Government said to the Irish landlords was to this effect—"When no prudent man would willingly have incurred fresh liability, when agitation was increasing and rents were failing, when you were being denounced throughout Ireland as a criminal class, you came forward and incurred liabilities for the good of the people and of the State; in return for this we will now deprive you of a portion of the means by which you could hope to discharge those liabilities with any ease. Such is your reward for your action in a time of difficulty; such is the encouragement we offer you to devote yourselves in the future to the service of your country at a time of trial." The Attorney General insinuated—and it was an insinuation that could only derive value from that want of knowledge of the details of Irish affairs which, to a certain extent, prevailed in all English audiences—although it had been contradicted over and over again, that the £1,250,000 had gone into the pockets of the Irish landlords, instead of which, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew perfectly well, it had simply gone from the hands of the landlords into the hands of the Irish people and into the soil of Ireland. The benefit which would be derived by the landlords from that expenditure would be indirect, remote, and uncertain, while the benefit to the tenant was direct and immediate. Well, then the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of Irish distress as the necessity for this Bill. On this subject of Irish distress he thought he could back his knowledge against that of the Attorney General for Ireland. He did not say so in any spirit of arrogance; but thought it was his duty to let the House know what had come under his personal notice. He happened for a period of 10 weeks, when the distress was at its height, to be associated with a Committee that was relieving that distress on a very vast scale, and his work in connection with it occupied him, almost without intermission, from eight to ten hours a-day during that time. He was in constant communication with the Local Government Board and its Inspectors, and with the Inspectors employed by the Committee, and with Chairmen of Boards of Guardians in all parts of the country. If any person absolutely free from all responsibility and care, and perfectly unprejudiced, had had an opportunity of ascertaining the real extent and nature of the distress, he was that person; and he did not hesitate to say that although the distress was most severe at times and in parts and would have been most disastrous but for the relief afforded, yet it never at any time, and did not now, warrant the introduction of a Bill of that kind. The people had been nobly supported through the crisis not by the charity of one country or another, but by the charity of the world; and he gladly recognized the conspicuous services of the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Gray) and the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) in stimulating that charity. Not only had food been received in enormous quantities, but clothes and bedding, and immense quantities of excellent seed, to aid in securing a return of former prosperity. But, although the distress was great, the fraud and imposture which sprang up alongside of it were also great. Although the relief afforded was great the demoralization occasioned by it was also great. He did not think there could be any doubt in disinterested minds that if Ireland, under God's providence, were blessed with a good harvest this year, the Irish people would be able to extricate themselves from their difficulties without recourse to any such violent measures as that now proposed by the Government. He could quote volumes of testimony in support of that assertion, but would not weary the House with it. He preferred resting his case on the statements and arguments of Members of Her Majesty's Government; he would not notice the statement of the noble Lord the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Lord Frederick Cavendish), when he said the other afternoon that the distress was not of a very exceptional nature, because he did not think the noble Lord had had an opportunity of knowing what the extent of the distress was. He would rather remind the House of the remarkable statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett), made a few days ago, which showed that the deposits in the Savings Banks in Ireland had absolutely increased in the last year all over Ireland, and increased even in the distressed districts. In spite of the distress, there had not only been no decrease, but, on the contrary, an increase. He thought that the faces of the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary for Ireland grew uncommonly gloomy as they listened to that statement of the right hon. Gentleman. Again, he asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland the other day why, if the distress was so severe and intense as to warrant the introduction of such a Bill, a grant to relieve it had not been made from the Imperial Treasury? If the distress were sufficient to warrant the Government in plundering one particular class, why was it not great enough to warrant them in granting the money out of the Imperial Treasury? Taking, then, into account his own experience and the statements and arguments of Members of the Government, he maintained that if the Bill was supported on the ground of existing distress, it was put forward on a ground entirely inadequate and fallacious. The Attorney General for Ireland entirely ridiculed the view advanced as to the uses which the Irish tenants would make of the Bill to the disadvantage of the landlord, and he said that to substantiate such views it should be shown that Irish tenants were all knaves and Irish County Court Judges all fools; and he asked, were they on that side of the House prepared to show that? Well, he, for one, was not prepared to use such bad language; but he knew the acute and natural intelligence of the Irish people, and he was prepared to say that the advantages which would be derived by the tenantry under this Bill, without their being liable to such savage imputations, would not be inferior to the advantages which would be derived in a case where the tenant was a knave and a Judge was a fool; and he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had very little doubt in his mind on that point. It had been said that the Bill was an attack upon property. The Attorney General for Ireland had jeered at that assertion; but he wondered whether the Prime Minister could inform the House what he considered the value of a Parliamentary title to land in Ireland now was. When the Encumbered Estates Court Act passed much was said as to the value of a Parliamentary title. One distinguished Law Lord said that the purchaser would have a clear title; another, that he would have a fresh title; another, an unencumbered title; and Lord Campbell, then Lord Chancellor of Ireland, said—"This Bill will give titles which will be good against all the world, and purchasers of estates under this Bill will have a title which nothing can affect." When the Land Act of 1870 passed prices of land hardly fluctuated. Notwithstanding much agitation, prices rose after the passing of the Act from 20 to 22, 23, and 24 years' purchase. What was the case now? Since the introduction of the Bill, sales of land in the Landed Estates Court had come to a dead stop. Purchasers would not come forward. Capital acted instinctively and almost unerringly; it refused investment in Irish land. The present Government were, it was supposed, ambitious to acquire renown as Land Reformers; but how could they hope to gain the confidence of the people if, as a consequence of their first step in land legislation, a Parliamentary title which had been thought the most desirable became the most worthless, depending no longer on the honour of the British Parliament; but merely on the exigencies of Party, and on the hourly demands which the Business of the House might make on the patience and fortitude of Ministers. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, in the extremely able and ingenious speech with which he had introduced the Bill, told the House that it merely carried out the spirit of the Land Act. He had never been one of those who denounced the Land Act of 1870. No one acquainted with Ireland—with its history, its people, with its customs of land tenure and land cultivation—could, he thought, truthfully assert that the Act of 1870 was not a necessary Act, that it was not wise in its purpose, and had never been, on the whole, beneficial in its operation; and he was prepared to co-operate in any attempt which, consistently with justice to all parties, would still further ameliorate the condition of the Irish farmer. But what was the spirit of the Land Act? It was to secure to the tenant compensation for his improvements, and to restrain the landlord from capricious evictions, and from arbitrary increases of rent. But the cardinal and leading feature of the Land Act was the inviolability of the rent which the landlord demanded and which the tenant agreed to pay. The rent was the one incident of a tenancy which the Act respected and safeguarded, and which Parliament refused to endanger. What did this Bill provide? That, under certain circumstances, the existence of which was to be determined by an inferior Court of Justice, and by an official, the lowest possible in the judicial scale, the rent should not be enforced without the landlord having to pay heavily for its enforcement. That, he maintained, was a correct description of the principle of the Bill, which was utterly opposed to the principle and spirit of the Land Act. He could prove his statements by the illogical position which the Government occupied. If the Bill was framed in the spirit of the Land Act, why was it not made permanent in its operation and universal in its scope? It was because it was opposed to the principles of preceding legislation that it was limited both in time and extent; for the Government knew very well that if they had proposed to make the Bill a permanent one their tenancy of the Government Bench would be very insecure. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had a most powerful mind; but he was obliged to have recourse to the most extraordinary shifts to justify the measure. He said the other night with great accuracy that it was not in the power of the Irish landlord to raise his rents without becoming liable for compensation under the clauses of the Land Act. He then went on to make the extraordinary and unparalleled announcement—"The circumstances of the present year were equivalent to an increase of rent"—those were his very words. What, in the name of Heaven, did that mean but that failure of the earth to produce her accustomed fruits, owing to the operation of great national laws, uncontrollable, unknown, and unforeseen, which gave us an increase of cold and moisture, and a decrease of sunshine and warmth, was equivalent to, or exactly the same thing as, an arbitrary increase of rent by landlords throughout Ireland generally? That argument, it had been said, was in the spirit of the Land Act. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) appealed to the Prime Minister to say whether he was not right when he said that the Land Act was passed to protect tenants from the arbitrary action of the landlord, and not to save them, at the expense of an equally suffering landlord, from the operations of the phenomena of nature? That was an instance of the extraordinary shifts—the weak shifts—to which the Chief Secretary had been obliged to have recourse to justify the measure. He would give the House another example of his arguments. The right hon. Gentleman had said how unfair it was that a tenant living on one side of a particular boundary under the Ulster custom could not be turned out even for non-payment of rent without being compensated, while on the other side of the boundary a tenant not under the Ulster custom could be evicted for non-payment of rent without any compensation. That, no doubt, was a very melancholy thing, as all poverty and all distress and misfortune were pitiful and melancholy; but the Chief Secretary had altogether forgotten to tell the House that the tenant under the Ulster custom had bought and paid for his right to compensation, which was as much his property as the furniture of his house, and that the other, outside the boundary, had no such property, and had made no such purchase. The Bill, however, proposed to confer on him a property which was never his, and at the expense, not of the State, but of the class least able to bear it. If that was in the spirit of the Land Act, why had not the Prime Minister in 1870 legalized and extended the Ulster custom over the whole of Ireland? He had refused to do so at the time; and now it was too late, besides being entirely inaccurate, to say that the extension of the custom—for that was what the Bill really came to—was in the spirit of the Land Act. The Chief Secretary had made a great point of the increased number of evictions; but, in stating the figures, he had taken care not to tell the House the real cause of that increase. Here and there, in Ireland as in all other countries, there were hard landlords; but, in the great majority of cases, wherever there was a real inability to pay rent, the landlords had come forward to remit them. ["No, no!"] If he was wrong, the statement easily admitted of refutation. He would remark, however, that the Land League in Dublin had published a statement to the effect that the recent remissions of rent amounted to £3,000,000. The real cause of the great majority of the evictions was that the tenants were not allowed to pay their rents. They did not dare for their lives to do so, on account of the tremendous pressure put upon them by the land agitators, the secret societies, and those who advised them to "keep a firm grip of their land." The majority of evictions were resorted to because tenants had set up a claim to the fee simple of the soil; and the cause of them was not the cruelty of landlords, nor the general distress, but the maxim, "keep a firm grip of your land," to which the right hon. Gentleman had lent the whole weight of the authority of the Government, when he introduced this measure. There was another inconceivable inconsistency in the attitude of the Government. They brought in a Bill of the most remarkable and forcible character, and, at the same time, told the House that they were going to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation of the Land Act. What did the issue of that Commission mean but that the Government wanted information? Nay, more; the issue of a Commission at the time when another Commission was sitting to inquire into precisely the same subject meant that the Government were so absolutely without information that immediate and concentrated inquiry was absolutely necessary before they could move a single step. And yet, having made this announcement, they had introduced a measure which nothing but the most exhaustive and impartial inquiry, the fullest information, could possibly justify. It was said that the Bill was only a temporary measure. That was the account given of it by the Government, and he would take it for granted that such was their intention. But it must be remembered that its effects would be permanent in this way—it would instruct the people, it would give a new feature to the Land Question, it would greatly guide the Royal Commission, and it would greatly influence Parliament when further land legislation was presented to it next year. The House ought to bear in mind that, if it adopted the measure, its action would not be free and unfettered when future legislation was proposed; and yet they were asked to tie their hands before dealing with the most difficult question by a Government that confessed, without scruple, almost without shame, that they were absolutely without information. He could mention another circumstance that ought to make the House pause before giving its assent to the Bill. The Chief Secretary had told them that, perhaps, he should hardly be believed in saying that when he took Office he had not the slightest idea that it would be incumbent on him to introduce such a Bill. For his own part, he had no difficulty whatever in believing the right hon. Gentleman; he felt sure that the Government had all along intended to squeak through the Session, by hook or by crook, without touching the Irish Land Question; and they would have succeeded in their intention, no doubt, had it not been for the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), which came on, by some extraordinary accident, in the small hours one morning. He was present, and he saw the dismay that came over the faces of the Chief Secretary and the Prime Minister as they listened to the arguments of the hon. Member for Mayo in behalf of his modest proposals, and as they detected the gathering storm in the Irish Party, in case they should refuse to consider the measure. Where would be their "Supply?" Where would be the Estimates? Where the poor hares and rabbits? Where would be the unfortunate elect of Northampton in case the Irish Party should be allowed to get its "back up?" The Bill was a device suddenly invented to meet that great danger. It was "a Ten Minutes' Bill," if ever there was one, and no part of the original policy of the Government; an afterthought, not a deliberately counselled measure; an inspiration, but not from above. The fact was, that this Bill was intended not for the relief of Irish distress, but for the purpose of oiling a portion of the Parliamentary machine, which threatened to become dangerously rusty. It was for that small and temporary purpose of oiling the Parliamentary machine that the House of Commons was asked to give its assent to legislation of a kind which was never before proposed to Parliament by a Government—which was based on principles so dangerously near to Communism, that only the most extraordinary coincidence of circumstances could in any degree justify it, and which had given to many of their own Party a shock from which they would take a long time to recover. This, then, was the Irish policy, long looked for, long promised, of this great Government! When the Chief Secretary took Office, he was evidently under the impression that he was conferring a great compliment on Ireland. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: No, I did not.] That was the inference he drew from the right hon. Gentleman's speeches and actions, which he had observed with great minuteness. He believed that the mere fact of his acceptance of that Office would change the face of the country and the nature of the people—that the mere fact of his arrival at Kingstown would calm the Irish nation. He had not been 24 hours in the country before he decided on a policy of conciliation. He came to the conclusion that the state of the country was so peaceful, that the inhabitants were so contented, life and property, law and order so absolutely secure, that the mild exceptional powers possessed by the late Government, though they might be good enough for them, were absolutely useless to the new Administration. The right hon. Gentleman at that time reminded him of a miner, going into a fiery and explosive mine, with which he was totally unacquainted, and declaring that safety lamps were, in his view, unnecessary incumbrances, and that an ordinary tallow candle was good enough for him. The right hon. Gentleman, after he had been a little longer in Ireland, came to the conclusion that the policy of conciliation, pure and undiluted, was, perhaps, a trifle risky, and the policy of conciliation developed into what he might call a policy of appeals. The Chief Secretary came down to the House and made a tremendous appeal to the Irishmen of the North—to the Protestant boys and Catholic boys of Ulster—to forget their differences and bury their animosities, and to unite in one hysterical embrace in celebration of his accession to Office. He then went on to make a powerful appeal to the Irish Members to co-operate with him in the task of governing Ireland, and to use their great influence to keep the country quiet; and, not content with this, he made a most pathetic appeal to the Irish landlords not to think of exacting their rents under any circumstances at the present moment, the whole burden of the appeals being—"For God's sake keep the country quiet, or what an awful hole I shall be in." The policy of appeals not proving altogether satisfactory, outrages going on as briskly as ever, and law being defied as successfully as ever, the policy of appeals developed into a policy of bribes—a policy which was marked by the generosity which was characteristic of people who were dealing with the property of others. He feared that the next phase of the Government policy would be one, and must be one, of repression; and he was the more afraid that this would be the case, because he had noticed that, in a recent speech of the Lord Lieutenant at the Mansion House in Dublin, the noble Lord had stated his intention to put the law in force in order to preserve peace in Ireland, and there could be no doubt that before long they would see the Chief Secretary come down to the House and ask for Westmeath Acts, Arms Acts, Curfew Acts, and other similar measures, which were always required for the government of Ireland whenever the Liberal Party was in power. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman laughed; but if he would look to history he would find that the whole history of Ireland was a series of repressive measures imposed by the Whigs, relaxed by the Tories, and reimposed by the Whigs. The Chief Secretary had said, in one of his outbursts of candour, that if there was another bad harvest in Ireland he would wish himself anywhere than where he was; but there was another day when he would wish himself anywhere than where he was, and that would be the day when he came down to ask Parliament for unconstitutional powers for the preservation of peace in Ireland. On that day he need not look for sympathy or approval of his policy. He had stimulated disorder and placed a premium on outrage, when he had not the courage to renew the Peace Preservation Act, and he stimulated disorder and placed a premium on agitation of the most violent kind, when he introduced this plundering Bill. He had deliberately and recklessly sowed the wind, and he would most certainly reap the harvest of the wind. He had shown the House that this was a Bill which, if it reposed on Irish distress for its justification, reposed on inadequate grounds. He had shown that it was a Bill which was in direct violation of the spirit of the Land Act. It was a Bill brought in by a Government which had freely confessed that it was without adequate information as to the requirements of the Land Question and the necessity of the case. It was a Bill brought in, not for the benefit of Ireland—on the contrary, it was fraught with disaster to Ireland and the Irish—but for the purpose of expediting the Government Business, and for the wretched purpose of rendering the government of Ireland momentarily easier, without one thought, or one spark of thought, as to the future welfare of the country. All were anxious to see the Government make progress with their legitimate Business, and they were all anxious to resume the discussion of the various measures which had been recommended in the Royal Speech; but, however anxious they might be in that matter, however desirous to bring this unsatisfactory Session to a speedy close, there were principles involved in this measure which Parliament could not sanction, and rights endangered by it which Parliament would never override.

MR. GLADSTONE: It appears to me, Sir, that the undoubted talents of the noble Lord who has just resumed his seat would have contributed much more substantially to the disposal and satisfactory issue of this question had he been less unmeasured in his imputations, had he been content to give a little more credit for deliberate considerations and for honest and upright intentions in regard to this measure, had he dealt less in physiognomy and in prophecy, and had he, in the historical portions of his speech, made greater approaches to accuracy. The Bill which is before the House is one which, in my opinion, will lose nothing by being discussed in a less lively spirit than was thought fitting for the occasion by the noble Lord. It is a Bill undoubtedly of great importance, because it is exceptional in its circumstances, exceptional in its provisions, and because it constitutes, on the part of the Executive Government, something in the nature of a promise or engagement to the poorest part of the population of Ireland, now suffering heavily under a severe visitation of Providence. Under these circumstances, a grave discussion is all I can promise to the House. The noble Lord says it is a Bill introduced for the purpose of "oiling the Parliamentary machine," and for the purpose of bribing supporters; and there are Gentlemen who agree with those views. [MR. WARTON: Hear, hear!] Nor can I wonder that they should so agree when I consider the inflamed and exaggerated accounts that have been given of this measure. The hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham), who spoke of it the other day, promised we should have harder language yet applied to the Bill than we have listened to. I entirely differ from the hon. Member for Leitrim, not because I am not willing to accept any promise he makes, but because no harder language that I am aware of is to be found in the dictionary. It has been described by the noble Lord, by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and some others, as "plunder," as "robbery," and as "confiscation;" and, having been so described, I wait to learn what are the harder words to be used of this measure. There have been exceptions, I am bound to say, to this inflammatory style. The right hon. Gentleman who was First Lord of the Admiralty in the last Parliament (Mr. W. H. Smith), though he indulged in the most dismal anticipations which, as I think, were quite unneeded by the case, yet carefully avoided everything like exaggerated description and everything like unwarranted attack. I have had the pleasure of seeing sitting behind him a Gentleman who made his first speech to the House on this question, in opposition, undoubtedly, to the Bill—I mean the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Brodrick)—which we believe to be a necessary, and, under the circumstances, a valuable measure; but who made the speech with an ability which promises much for his Parliamentary future, and, I am bound to say, with an evident love of truth and a manifest candour which are rarer in this House than ability, and upon which I offer him my congratulations. The noble Lord has given his version of the purpose of this Bill. Allow me to give mine. The noble Lord says it is a Bill to invade the principles of property. We say it is a Bill to maintain the principles of property. We say that, in the face of those afflicting circumstances which partially prevail in Ireland with an extreme severity, it is a Bill to enable the State with a safe conscience to use the strength at its command in order to maintain the rights of property and to enforce the provisions of the law. Now, this is the account we give of the purposes of this Bill, and I think that the account given by the noble Lord may be said to confute this. He says our only object was to conciliate the support—I translate his figurative language into prose—of those Gentlemen who act with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). It is always well to give your opponents credit for the possession of some degree of common sense and discernment; and I think the noble Lord, if he were a witness of the transactions of Saturday last, or if he were a witness of what passed in this House on Friday morning, must know that that charge bore on its face the stamp of absurdity, for no man in his senses could dream of imagining that by this measure, or any measure, we are likely to conciliate the approval of those Gentlemen. At the same time, it is the duty of the Government to listen with respect to the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and to all those who act with him, when they are uttering the words of truth and justice, and it is their duty to allow none of their differences with that hon. Member to cause them to prejudge the witness he may bear; but Her Majesty's Government would be less than children in the practice of the Business of the State and of Parliament, if they could be so weak as to suppose it was possible to bring the policy recommended by them to Parliament into harmony with the objects which the hon. Member for Cork is believed to pursue. The noble Lord, in speaking of the state of Ireland, appears to imagine that nothing has been done which is in the slightest degree exceptional, or which raises any dangerous principle into prominence, until Her Majesty's Government appeared with this Bill. He appears to think that all this is simply a matter of course. Now, we say, on the contrary, that the late and the present Governments and that both Parliaments have sanctioned, or are sanctioning, apart from this Bill, most exceptional measures. We have given loans to landlords at a nominal rate of interest. We have also permitted the indefinite extension of out-door relief to persons holding land, and thereby we have relaxed one of the most vital and essential principles of the Poor Law. We have advanced public money from the Exchequer to supply Irish occupiers with seed for the purpose of sowing their land. What are all these measures but measures of an extraordinary and exceptional character, produced by an extraordinary and exceptional state of things? ["Hear!"] I am glad to see the noble Lord assents to that fact now;

but there was not the slightest trace in his speech of any impression or belief that these things were extraordinary at all. He seemed to me to be like the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, who was generous at the public charge, and said—"I do not mind what amount of relief you give to these people, provided you give it out of public funds." ["Quite right."] But these are suggestions and doctrines of the most dangerous character. When you have arrived at a state of things in which you are compelled to make the funds of the whole country—I am now speaking principally of Ireland—responsible for the support of a portion of the country, you have arrived at a state of things so exceptional that it is impossible to contend it may not be necessary, in some matters affecting private rights, to consider the state of the law on other points besides those which have been actually raised. Now, Sir, hon. Gentlemen opposite have thought that they produced a damning argument against this Bill when they mentioned that some London solicitors were debating whether it was safe to allow money to be lent on mortgage in Ireland. Do they suppose that this is the first date at which that idea has entered into the minds of London solicitors? I happen to be acquainted, more or less, with the proceedings of one of the first firms of solicitors in London; and with them it has, I believe, been the uniform practice—unless it has been very lately corrected owing to the improved circumstances of Ireland—to insert in wills a provision that the sums to be invested under a will might be invested in real property in England or Scotland, but not in Ireland. So much for that particular instance. With respect to this Bill, the noble Lord has referred to one or two points which, perhaps, are fitter for discussion in Committee than at the present moment. He states that the delicate and difficult question that is opened by the Bill is to be referred to the decision of a gentleman who is at the bottom of the judicial hierarchy. That officer will discharge this duty subject to appeal; and, moreover, he will discharge this duty with the advantage of the experience he has acquired under the Land Act in deciding questions very much of the same order. At the same time, the question whether it is right that exceptional provisions should be accompanied by a modification of the tribunal before which cases are to be tried is evidently a question which may be very well considered in Committee on the Bill. Another important question has been raised by the Notice given by an hon. Baronet (Sir Tollemache Sinclair) of a Motion to be made before Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair. The substance of it is, as I understand it, that this Bill shall not apply in cases where a landlord is willing to allow the tenant to sell his goodwill. That, undoubtedly, is a very important proposition; but it is a proposition with regard to which I am in a position to state it is the belief of the drawers of the Bill that it is incorporated in the measure as it now stands, inasmuch as no Judge in his senses could possibly allow the Bill to apply in a case where a landlord had been willing to allow the tenant to sell his goodwill. I refer to these matters for the purpose of showing that this is not the time for a Member of Her Majesty's Government to dwell largely upon them. It is the principle of the Bill that is now challenged; and while the principle of the Bill is so challenged, as involving robbery, plunder, and confiscation, it is idle for us to tender to opponents who hold such views Amendments which might meet reasonable objections and mitigate alarm. As regards a large portion of the opposition to this measure, I must say it is a revival of the hostility, the smouldering hostility, to the Land Act. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] I believe that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire did not attempt to conceal that, so far as he was concerned, this was the case, for I think he said this measure was a renewal and an extension of the most vicious principle of the Land Act. That was a fair and frank avowal; but I am glad to hear from the noble Lord who has just sat down that he does not share that view. Upon that we shall have more to say by-and-bye; but, in the meantime, let me ask hon. Members to place themselves upon the starting-point of the Land Act for Ireland, before it is possible for them to form any just or comprehensive judgment upon this Bill. Now, Sir, it seems to be thought sufficient by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire to say that this Bill interferes with the principles of property; that by this Bill, in certain circumstances, you take something from A and give it to B; and that this fact is enough to prove the Bill to be plunder, robbery, and spoliation. Has the hon. Member addressed his mind to a review of the legislation of Parliament during the last 50 years? Why, Sir, I should spend more than the time which I could fairly ask from the House for all I have to say were I to set out in detail the instances in which during the last 50 years the Parliament of this country has interfered with the principles of property. The principles of property are vital to the welfare of the State. They are at the very base of the social system; but, notwithstanding these great and fundamental truths, it is not less true that there are occasions when, not merely necessity calls upon you to modify the extreme application of those principles, but when the introduction of modifications are the best and the only means by which you can effectually preserve the principle of property itself. Let us see whether this is so or not. My doctrine is, not only that there are ample precedents for interference and for a modification of the extreme application of the ordinary principles of property, but that those precedents have been good and sound precedents, and have marked out a course of action in which it is safe and wise to walk. What examples shall I adduce? I will not go so far as to cross the Atlantic and appeal to the important legislation, both ecclesiastical and civil, as regards Canada. But what of the Tithe Commutation Act of England? Did you take nothing in that case from A and give it to B? Yes; you took from the clergy of the country the entire prospective increase of tithe on the produce of the land, and you handed it to the landlords. Did any hon. Member for Lincolnshire rise then and, on the part of the clergy, protest against this "monstrous injustice," this "violation of the principles of property?" I believe that this was a justifiable, a wise, and expedient measure; but it was, undoubtedly, an interference—and a very strong interference—with the application of the principles of property; because the right of the clergy, the right of the tithe proprietor, to the future increase of the produce was a right just as much belonging to him as was the right of the landlord to the increase beyond what was covered by the tithes. And what happened in Ireland at the same time? Did Parliament scruple to interfere in Ireland? It took away, with the unanimous assent alike of Conservative and Liberal politicians, one-fourth part of the property of the tithe-owner, handed it over to the landowner, imposed upon the landowner the responsibility of collection, valued that responsibility at 25 per cent, but never asked the tithe-owner whether he agreed to the valuation, or the landowner whether he was prepared to assume the burden. It is impossible to conceive a stronger interference with the principles of property than was involved in this. If I understood the Bill which the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire has introduced, it, too, interferes with the principles of property. According to my reading of it, it provides, with regard to the agricultural holdings of the country, that unless the landlord can agree with the tenant, on certain terms as to the property in improvements, the laws of compensation laid down as voluntary laws by the Agricultural Holdings Act shall be compulsorily applied. [Mr. CHAPLIN dissented.] The hon. Gentleman, I see, disputes my reading. I will give way if he wishes to explain; but that is my reading of the Bill. Undoubtedly, among the invasions of the principle of property the Irish Land Act holds a conspicuous place. And its justification, just as in the other cases we have found a justification, is the wisdom of its provisions with regard to the social state and the general interests of Ireland. It was a Bill ostensibly dealing with the interests of the landowner in a manner injuriously affecting those interests—ostensibly and prima facie; but we contended that although it might bear that appearance, and be subject to the imputation of "robbery," of "plunder," and of "confiscation," yet it was a Bill so required by the circumstances of Ireland, so adapted to those circumstances, that the effect of it would be to confer benefit upon the country at large, upon the landlord as well as the tenant. We shall see by-and-bye how far that is true. But let me remind the House now what the Land Act did. It did not extend the Ulster tenant right to the whole of Ireland—that has been most justly and truly stated by the noble Lord—but it did create over the whole of Ireland, beyond the limits of Ulster tenant right and of any analogous custom, sporadically elsewhere, an interest, an estate, a property of the tenant in his holding which did not exist before. That was done by the act of the Legislature; and it is from the creation of that interest and property that you must set out if you want to arrive at any true and just solution. It has been said that the principle of the Land Act was that no compensation for disturbance should be paid when an action for ejectment was brought for non-payment of rent. I am not going to dissemble or extenuate the importance of this provision of the Land Act; but it appears to me to be a gross misnomer to call that the principle of the Land Act. The principles of the Land Act were its main provisions, not those subordinate provisions. The principles of the Land Act were mainly two—to secure occupiers full compensation for their improvements, which was taking from the landlord what belonged to him and giving it to the tenant; and, secondly, after creating and constituting this estate on behalf of the tenant, this interest in his holding which he never had before, the general principle of the Land Act was that, over and above his improvements, if dislodged from his holding, he was to receive compensation according to the limit of a scale on a maximum which was determined by the Act. I quite admit that to that principle there was a most important exception—namely, that eviction should not be “disturbance” in cases where it was founded on non-payment of rent. That was a great exception to the principle. But there were exceptions to that exception; and I wish the House to take into view—not because I think it is the only or, perhaps, even the principal matter we have now to consider, but as a matter which we cannot exclude from view—the terms in which the Land Act was introduced by the Government, the terms on which it was accepted by the House; because, be it recollected, that those terms were cordially agreed to by men so little revolutionary as Lord Carlingford, Lord Cardwell, and Lord Clarendon; and, further, that the Bill containing these proposals was introduced into and read a second time in this House unanimously. Lord Beaconsfield—Mr. Disraeli, as he then was called—did not find in those principles, introduced by the Land Act for the first time, any reason why he should dispute the second reading of the

Bill. When the Bill was carried through this House, it contained a provision, as I have said, that an eviction for non-payment of rent should not be a disturbance; but to that was appended a most important qualification. The mind of the House of Commons was that eviction for non-payment of rent should not be a disturbance, unless there were special circumstances which, in the view of the Judge, should make it so. That was the principle. [Sir GABRIEL GOLDNEY: As to existing tenancies.] Quite so; quite so. Well, that was the principle to which this House committed itself, with, again, a limitation which I am about to mention. The Land Act was in our view a new point of departure for Ireland. We laid down that rule for existing tenancies, without extending it to future tenancies. Nor do I at all attempt to escape from the importance of that admission. What I now call upon you to observe is that that enactment was adopted by the House of Commons by a large majority; and that, with the unanimous acceptance of the Bill on the second reading, was an enactment far wider in its scope than the proposal of my right hon. Friend. The proposal to which Lord Carlingford, Lord Cardwell, and Lord Clarendon agreed was a proposal far wider than that denounced to-day as a proposal of “plunder,” of “robbery,” and of “confiscation.” That Bill, I freely admit, was limited to existing tenancies; and it is important we should consider the position in which we are placed by that limitation. And now a word to those who, when they have heard this description which I have given of the Land Act, may arrive at the conclusion that it, too, was an Act of “robbery, plunder, and confiscation.” These words are very easily produced and thrown at the head of your antagonist. There is a great temptation to make use of them, and sometimes, as I am inclined to contend, it is unmanly not to make use of them. But the whole question is, whether they are justified by the circumstances of the case? What were the facts with regard to this Land Act? Down to the time of the Land Act, what had been the history of legislation with respect to land in Ireland? Well, Sir, it had been this—and it is a melancholy chapter; and, as the noble Lord is fond of studying history, I recommend him to study this history, and see how it was that this House of Parliament and the other House of Parliament, until a wider access was given to popular influence—how it was that they held the scale of justice between landlord and tenant in Ireland? Everything was for the landlord and nothing for the tenant. We are told that the landlord is the natural friend, and the natural protector of the tenant. I rejoice to think that in a multitude of cases he is so, and that he is becoming so more and more. But that doctrine, unhappily, is not borne out by history, and you must be willing to recollect that these facts, these enactments, these proceedings, this policy, although it may pass away, though the Acts may be repealed, though the temper of Parliament may be changed, are branded ineffaceably upon the memory of a country, and we are prepared to allow largely, indulgently, for those nearly ineffaceable marks, and even to exceed in some cases, perhaps, the strict letter of reason, in consideration of those monstrous, prolonged, inveterate efforts which continued so long to dishonour the proceedings of Parliament, and which have accumulated a debt to the people of Ireland which it will be difficult to redeem. These were the grounds which brought us to introduce the Land Act. It was not any indifference to the principles of property. I never attempted for one moment to disguise the gravity of the legislation we proposed. I always endeavoured, as did my Friends near me, to justify it by the more than corresponding gravity of the case. Well, this Land Act was largely denounced as robbery, plunder, and confiscation, though I must do Lord Beaconsfield the justice to say that it was a credit to him—truly signal and deserved—that, with great sagacity, he was unwilling to commit himself in any conflict in which he saw he would be worsted; and, consequently, he reined in the impatience of a portion of his Party, and, instead of encouraging them to denounce the Land Act as a measure of plunder, robbery, and confiscation, he dissuaded them, or inhibited them, I do not know which, or educated them, so that they should not divide on the second reading of the Bill. But how did the Land Act—this measure of plunder, robbery, and confiscation—operate on the peace of Ireland? The agrarian offences committed in Ireland in the year 1869, the year before the Land Act, were 767. In 1870, the year of the Land Act, they were 1,329. Immediately after the Land Act a great change was seen, and for eight years—from 1871 to 1878—the average of the agrarian offences in that country, which had been in 1870, 1,329, had fallen to 247. That was the effect on the peace of the country. What was the effect on the interests of the landlord? Were his rents reduced? Were the prices he obtained for his land diminished? No. In Ireland we have some means of testing these assertions. The sales in the Landed Estates Courts are sufficient for the purpose. In the five years ending in 1870 the average number of years' purchase of estates sold in the Court was 21·8. In the years from 1870 to 1878 it was 22·25 years. That was not a very great, but it was a very solid, improvement. A new form of sale, moreover, had been introduced under the operation of the Land Act. A certain number of sales were made before the action of the Court which are not included in the figures I have read, when the land was bought by the tenants, and it was bought by the tenants at a price which must have seemed fabulous to all Irish landlords of the past, and in some cases must have made the mouths of English landlords water. In 1871 the price of land sold to tenants reached from 19 to 30 years' purchase. In 1872 it ranged from 18 to 27 years' purchase. In 1873 the mean was 36; in 1874 it was 29; in 1875 it was 26; in 1876 it was 29; in 1877 it was 26; and in 1878 it was 26. I ask those hon. Gentlemen who still denounce the Land Act as robbery and confiscation, or who, like the noble Lord, are willing to admit that the Land Act was necessary, but, having swallowed the camel, still strain at the gnat—I ask them whether, looking to the effect of the Land Act, and contrasting that with the depression of land at the present moment, if the true inference does not appear to be that another measure, similar in spirit, but carefully guarded and restricted, is now wanted to improve the social state of Ireland and give additional security to land? The noble Lord has, if I may say so, a good deal attenuated the character of the Irish distress. He refers with just pride to his own exertions and those of his distinguished relatives in guiding the stream of charity for the purpose of mitigating the calamity of the time. But, without the least contesting what he had said with regard to the imposture that creeps in, not only to the waste but absolute perversion of the funds intended for the relief of suffering, I find quite enough in the statement of the noble Lord which admits that, although very partial in its character, yet that this distress is one of extreme severity. I believe it is not understating it, or overstating it, when we say that the two bad harvests of 1877 and 1878 were succeeded in 1879 by a harvest which in parts of Ireland was the very worst known since the time of the great Irish Famine. With these bad harvests the number of evictions increased. With the bad harvest of 1879 their number was greatly increased. The general conduct of the landlords, I admit, was highly to their honour, although there were exceptions. But, upon the whole, I call attention to the statement of my right hon. and learned Friend (the Attorney General for Ireland) in his most able speech. He pointed out that this was a distress due to the act of God—the succession of bad harvests produced in parts of Ireland an extreme state of things. In the failure of the crops, crowned by the year 1879, the act of God had replaced the Irish occupier in the condition in which he stood before the Land Act. Because, what had he to contemplate? He had to contemplate eviction for non-payment of rent; and, as a consequence of eviction, starvation. And this eviction, it is no exaggeration to say, in a country where the agricultural pursuit is the only pursuit, and where the means of the payment of rent are entirely destroyed for the time by the visitation of Providence, that the poor occupier may in these circumstances regard the sentence of eviction as coming, for him, very near to a sentence of starvation. Such was the state of things we had to contemplate; and when the noble Lord is severe on the conduct of the Government he will, perhaps, remember the number of weeks that have elapsed since we took the reins of power. I admit that when we passed the Land Act we did not foresee everything. We hoped we were going to pass into a normal condition. We sought in good faith to do that which we told the landlord we desired to do. We told him that while, on the one hand, we created a new estate for the tenant in the soil; on the other hand, we did not desire to give him, not only a continuance of security, but an increase of security, for the payment of his rent; and such, I believe, has been the effect of the Land Act. But I admit we did not foresee every contingency. We did not foresee that there would arise in Ireland, though only in parts of it, a state of things analogous to that state of things which led to the legislation of 1847. It has arisen, and the question is, how are we to deal with it? We are now going, I admit, to constitute an exception to the Land Act. What justification ought we to show for the exception? In my opinion, it should be shown—first, that the necessity is strong; secondly, that the remedy is carefully adapted and carefully limited to the necessity; and, in the third place, that the case is of such a nature that we have taken effectual precautions against being betrayed unawares into the establishment of a dangerous precedent. Let me try the case under these three heads. We are going to establish an exception to the Land Act. Well, it is well to consider to what it is we are going to establish an exception; because here, again, I believe, that until the discussion of this Bill began, many hon. Members were quite unaware of the real position of the landlord in Ireland with regard to remedies for the recovery of his land in cases of non-payment of rent. The noble Lord said he would not refer to the legal subtleties in the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland; but there were some legal portions of that speech that were not subtleties at all. A great and broad principle was laid down, in the first instance, in the able speech of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), which was more largely unfolded by my right hon. and learned Friend; and I want to know from the lawyers on that side, as well as on this, whether it is true or not? The proposition is this—that every remedy which the landlord possesses for the recovery of his rents is left intact and entire by this Bill, and will remain in full force should this Bill become law. Did the noble Lord, who followed the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend very acutely and vigilantly, hear that statement? He did not contradict it. He is aware that it is true. He is aware that, by this plunder and confiscation, the landlord in Ireland, without the sacrifice of one farthing, will have every power that the landlord in England now has for the recovery of his rent. Surely, if that be so—and whether it is so the House is, perhaps, pretty well in a condition to judge—it may be thought that these attacks on the Government, as if they were undermining the foundations of property, are somewhat premature. Now, Sir, here, again, we come upon the painful history of British legislation. The House of Commons—and yet more the House of Lords—have legislated against the Irish tenants. They have provided and strengthened remedies unknown to the spirit of the English law for the purpose of increasing the power of the landlord over his tenant. I understand that anything like eviction for the non-payment of rent was unknown to the law of this land until the reign of George I., and it was then introduced as applicable exclusively to the case of leases. Various Acts were passed of which it is unnecessary to follow the history; and it was by the Acts of 1851 and 1860 that the Parliament of this country thought fit to establish and make effectual against the Irish occupier remedies of which the landlords in Scotland and in England knew nothing, and processes more stringent and severe than any previously adopted. I am quite unaware of any reason why the power of the landlord should have been fortified by such processes, which were not recognized by the general law of the land. The consequence of this was that the power of eviction was extended from leases to tenants at will and tenants from year to year; it was extended alike to cases of parole and of written agreement; and, having first been brought in subject to the limitation in amount imposed upon the Civil Bill Courts or the County Courts, the power was enlarged so as to embrace in its sweep the whole of the tenants in Ireland. Be it recollected it is only to that law—and not to the general law of the land for the recovery of rent, which will remain wholly untouched, as it is in England—it is only to this particular law, introduced, as I may say, behind the back of the Irish occupier, almost in fraud of the Irish occupier, that we propose an exception. I do not say on that account that an exception is to be justified beyond what necessity and prudence require. Well, Sir, is the necessity not strong? It appears to us it is exceedingly strong. You have a visitation affecting the crops in a part of Ireland such, at any rate, as comes but once in a generation, for there has been no such visitation since 1847, or for the third part of a century. You have had, as we believe, capricious evictions to a certain and limited extent practised in Ireland, and those who have practised them are chargeable with bringing upon their more numerous and better-minded brethren in the class of landlord the consequences of their misconduct. We have had, as has already been stated, a great increase in the number of these ejectments. It appears from a Return of the ejectments reported to the Constabulary, that in 1846 there were 79; in 1878, 834; in 1879, 1,698; and in five months and 20 days of this year, 1,060—showing a proportion more than double this year over last, and a number last year more than double that of the year before. But these are only the numbers reported to the Constabulary. If we look to the total numbers we find that in 1878 there were 1,749; in 1879, 2,677; and, as was shown by my right hon. and learned Friend, 1,690 in the first five and a-half months of this year—showing a further increase upon the enormous increase of last year, and showing, in fact, unless it be checked, that 15,000 individuals will be ejected from their homes, without hope and without remedy, in the course of the present year. This is a serious and formidable state of things when it comes upon the back of long, angry, and sore recollections connected with a lengthened period of misgovernment in Ireland. Sir, to that only requires to be added the recollection of how it is that the law is enforced. In the West Riding of Galway alone nearly 3,500 men have been employed in enforcing the processes of the law; and these processes are now to be enforced not by units, nor by scores, for scores are not sufficient, but by hundreds; and when you have arrived at a state of things, however it be limited to a portion of the country—and I rejoice to think it is—in which hundreds of peace officers are required to be employed for the purpose of enforcing evictions, you have got dangerously near to something that would be called local civil war. If that is the case, the necessity is strong; and what is the remedy we propose to apply? Is it not a carefully limited and guarded remedy? You may devise other limitations if you will; but you will only devise them after you have come to recognize the necessity and to be in a condition so to devise them that they shall not interfere with the efficiency and purpose of this measure; and you will not devise them so long as you are content to indulge in the large and exaggerated accusations you have rained down in such abundance. Why does the noble Lord charge us with being in contradiction with ourselves, and say that we have had no information with reference to the subject-matter and scope of the Bill? It is one thing to have information with reference to a temporary necessity in the exceptional state of things created for us and recognized by this Bill; it is quite another kind of information which would be requisite for the purpose of renewing all the provisions of the Land Act, and considering in what respects they have succeeded, and in what they may have partially failed. We have ample information; the few figures stated to the House are ample to justify the present measure. It is limited in time, though, I believe, a particular date is not very easy to fix mathematically. It is limited in place again. We have drawn a line, the only one practicable for us to draw, perhaps not mathematically exact, but, at the same time, indicating a distinct intention. It is limited in subject-matter, because, as the noble Lord has seen, not one farthing can be allowed by the Judge under this Bill unless where, first, there is inability to pay; secondly, it is proved to be due to the recent visitation of Providence; thirdly, the tenant is willing to accept reasonable terms; and fourthly, the landlord unreasonably refuses them. For the interpretation of the word "reasonable," I will only refer to the Bill of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire with regard to tenants' improvements. These are the limitations, and if you think there are others state them, and let us get rid of these general charges. The question now is, whether we establish a prima facie case for the principle of the Bill that something ought to be done to prevent those extreme calamities which will arise when a portion of the nation, deprived by the act of God of the means of payment, is to be liable to eviction, absolutely without resource, and to the total confiscation of that estate provided for the tenant by the Land Act, in instances in which he has nothing to do with the unfortunate circumstances which expose him to it. And now with regard to the third condition I laid down, that the cause ought to be so well defined that you should not, unawares, establish precedents in cases of this kind. I will make this admission to the noble Lord and others who have spoken, that no man is more reluctant than I am to depart from the principles of the Land Act, and especially from that part of it which aims at giving the landlord increased security for the payment of his rent. I think it is almost an obligation of personal honour for us who were parties to it to maintain in spirit, though we may not in the letter, the whole bearing of the conditions of that Act for the improvement of the position of the owner as well as of that of the occupier. For that reason, I am as jealous as the noble Lord or anyone else can be of being led by this Bill to establish a precedent with respect to which I wish to reserve a perfectly clear discretion. But I venture to point out to the noble Lord, that if he is afraid of the precedent we establish by this Bill, the true danger of establishing such a precedent is to be found in the speeches of those who assert that it contains all those ulterior, wider, and unnecessary changes which we ourselves have declined to recognize as having any connection with the Bill, and as to which we desire to maintain our perfect freedom. Sir, I cannot state too broadly what I conceive to be the great safeguard which marks the present legislation as exceptional legislation, and which reserves for future and free consideration every other question, great and small, connected with the Irish Land Act. The security is that you have already created by Parliamentary legislation this exceptional state of things. I think the noble Lord was unintentionally most unjust to my right hon. and learned Friend in saying that he spoke in a spirit of vindictive legislation against the landlords. I do not speak in that sense; I wish to recognize their claims. I do not think my right hon. and learned Friend was in the slightest degree chargeable with that intention. For myself, I wish to avoid it, for I should regard it as a very great offence indeed. But you must take the facts as they stand. I regard the owner no less than the occupier as suffering in this instance by the act of God—not suffering to the same extent, but as truly suffering by the the act of God; and Parliament has recognized that state of facts, and has come down to contribute to the support of one portion of the community at the expense of the rest of the community. Well, Sir, that is the state of things. This is a proceeding on the part of Parliament which, if it were made common, would be pretty nearly a dissolution of society. It is a principle of the utmost danger, to be watched with the greatest jealousy—aye, just as great jealousy as the principle which is embodied in the present Bill. What has Parliament actually done? It has granted £1,250,000 in the shape of loans to the landlords. Supposing that sum to be taken, how much of it is the landlord to pay back? He is to pay it back subject to a deduction of £36 per £100; so that the portion of the £1,250,000 offered to the landlord for the improvement of his estate—[Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Not merely as a boon.]—I know it is not a mere boon to the landlord. I am speaking simply of what the State is doing for the landlord and the occupier together. I cannot consent to regard their interests as separate, as the noble Lord seems to do. Of the £1,250,000, no more than £800,000 can ever come back to the Church Surplus; so that £450,000 is a gift. Of the £250,000 advanced to Guardians, reckoning it in the same way, the re-payment will be made less £16 for every £100—that is, there will be a gift of £40,000; £200,000 more is now to be placed at the disposal of the Government for the purpose of meeting this distress. Well, Sir, that is a sum in all of £690,000 actually given in relief to various bodies in Ireland. But you will, perhaps, say that the State has done nothing. The State has done little compared with what the Church Surplus has done; but, at the same time, the State gives £130,000. We have given a large sum of money—£600,000—for two years, without interest, to purchase seed, and £45,000 for piers, and we have just made a remission of interest as to the Church Surplus Fund of £54,000—that is, £130,000 of the total figures I have read of £820,000. Now, I am not drawing a distinction, or saying that all this is for the landlords; but I say it is given to the landlords and tenants together, of these districts—it is the gift of the State, and of Ireland particularly, from an Irish Fund, to the landlords and tenants of these districts. Now, let us divide a little between the tenant and the landlord. Where would the landlord have been if this gift had not been made? Are we really so cruel to him in proposing that in exceptional and extreme cases, where a man has no power to pay, he shall have some indulgence, limited and guarded as it is by the Bill? In answering that question, consider the position in which the landlord once stood towards the law. Why, Sir, he stood liable, through the medium of Parliament, to feed sufficiently, out of the produce and value of his land, every one of those hungry mouths—liable to well and sufficiently sustain them, and that without aid from a Church Surplus or the Exchequer. That, Sir, is the direct, the absolute, the legal liability of the landlords of Ireland. Some men of singularly-framed minds may believe that Parliament has not, in providing these means for the landlord's assistance, enormously benefited his condition, and that we are other than wise in taking some precaution against his endangering the peace of the country by pursuing to the extreme those processes of eviction of which he has become the master by legislation, quite as peculiar, I will venture to say, as any now proposed. My right hon. and learned Friend has said, and truly said, that no doubt we, like others, are liable to err. Our object in this Bill is not to sooth the feelings of anyone—to conciliate the support of anyone. It is not our object to attain any indirect or secondary purpose. If there be a special object in it, it is this—that we may be enabled, with a firm and unflinching hand, to maintain the principles of law and order in Ireland. But we do regard with a repugnance—which some hon. Gentlemen do not, however, seem to feel—the introduction of armies of agents of the State, for such I may call them, of regiments of Constabulary, for the purpose of conducting what ought to be peaceful operations. You will tell me that this is all caused by the anti-rent agitation, and the noble Lord has complained of my right hon. and learned Friend because he did not dwell upon the existence of that anti-rent agitation. I admit the existence of that which, in some parts of the country, may, undoubtedly, be called a conspiracy—not against the payment of rent only, but against the payment of all just debts. I am not able to draw a distinction between rent and other debts. Rent must be regarded as a just debt, and no admission will be made by me, or by any of my right hon. Friends, I am quite sure, which will tend in any way to weaken that proposition. But what we fear and what we feel is this—that there is no such sure way of strengthening the anti-rent agitation as leaving some pleas of justice in the mouths of those who promote it; and that there is no way of making war upon the anti-rent agitation which is so sure to have effect as that of drawing a broad and clear line between the cases where a man is stripped by the visitation of Providence of means of payment and is willing to offer reasonable terms, subject to the tribunals of the country, and cases, which the noble Lord assumes to exist—I cannot say whether they exist or not—where, under the influence of the anti-rent agitation, persons able to pay allow themselves to lose house and home rather than pay. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: There are hundreds.] I do not say that such cases do not exist; but I confess I am greatly sceptical. It is supposing terrorism to have reached an extraordinary extent, and one not extensively proved to us. It is a somewhat astounding proposition to say that persons having no means of support on eviction are willing to be driven forth on the wide world when the means are in their pocket by which they might secure themselves in possession of their homes, which, whatever may be said of the Irish peasant, all will admit he most fondly loves. Sir, it is in order to oppose such agitation and conspiracy, it is in order to maintain effectually the rights of property, it is, at the same time, in order to maintain the peace of the country and the supremacy of the law, that we hope the House will not decline to pass a measure which we believe to be called for by a strong necessity, which we have endeavoured to limit to the bounds of that necessity, which rests wholly upon an exceptional state of things already created in characters that cannot possibly be mistaken by the proceedings of Parliament itself, and which we believe to be alike calculated to promote the comfort of the poorest of the population, the security of the rights of property, and the supremacy of the law in Ireland.

MR. MARUM said, he must take exception to the statement that the distress in Ireland was solely owing to the failure of the crops. He had a strong feeling that it sprang from the land tenure system and the altered agricultural conditions. It was the want of observation of these facts that had influenced the noble Lord and other speakers. The rental of Ireland, which was £4,000,000 before the Peninsular War, rose in 15 or 12 years to £9,000,000. He must here draw a broad and honourable distinction between the landlords of Ulster and those of the other Provinces. The landlords of Ulster had always observed rules in relation to their tenants which were ignored by the Southern landlords, and it was by the latter that the enormous increase of rent he had referred to was chiefly made. Under protective duties the value of land went on increasing till 1846, when the rent was £11,000,000. Up to the last two or three years tillage farming had suffered from the importation of corn, but live meat importations had struck the last blow at the Irish tenant farmer. While America was acting in this manner did the landlords of the United Kingdom take one step to support the tenants, in whose condition they ought to have had a partnership interest? On the contrary, it had been by coercion acts that they had met the tenantry. In the meantime the tenants had purchased the highways and public roads, and had built the workhouses and other institutions. These works were really accomplished by the tenants, and fully 25 per cent of the value of the estates in Ireland might be fairly chargeable with these works. As to the private works, by reclamation of the land by fences and other things on their private holdings, the tenantry had likewise contributed fully 25 per cent of the value of the estates. What ground, therefore, was there for hard words and talk of confiscation? He should think language of that kind might be better applied to the landlords than to the tenants. The tenant farmers had laboured under an increased cost of production, and, owing to the undulating soil and the humid climate, machinery could not be brought to bear to the extent in Ireland that it could in other more favourable countries. While the course of production had risen, the prices of produce had become reduced with wheat being sold more cheaply than it could be grown in Ireland. The home producer could not meet the foreign competitor. Within the last few years an enormous expansion of credit had taken place in Ireland, and farms were being worked by men who were deplorably in debt; and up to the present their pride had enabled them to struggle on. The present distress was said to be a temporary calamity and would pass away. On the contrary, the banking system had enabled the tenants to pay their rents; but the bubble had burst, and in 12 months a large part of them would be much worse off than now. If there were a good harvest the farmers would have a crowd of creditors coming on them; so that they had this anomaly, that it was almost immaterial to the tenant whether his harvest was a good one or a bad one. By the system of agency estates were often put into the hands of men who knew nothing of agriculture, and whose only principles were competitive letting and the absorption of tenant's interests; and, in the end, he noticed transformation of tillage into pasturage, and the consequent loss of crops. The hon. Member was arguing that by population and the decrease of tillage Ireland had lost £150,000,000 during the past 30 years, when—

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Member that the question before the House was the relief of distress in Ireland, and his observations scarcely seemed to him to be relevant to that question.

MR. MARUM intimated that he would reserve his observations for some future occasion when the subject of land tenure should be under discussion. In conclusion, he asked the House to bear in mind that while England was a commercial nation, Ireland was principally an agricultural country, and it should not, therefore, censure Irish Members very much if they asked that different principles of legislation should be applied to Ireland.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, he addressed the House not in his capacity as a Member of the Government, but as an Irish landlord who owned property in one of the scheduled districts. He was not in the least alarmed at the proposals of Her Majesty's Government, and what he said on this subject was the result of conviction and examination. If evil consequences had already been brought about in Ireland, he unhesitatingly asserted that they were the direct result of the exaggerated language used by the opponents of the Bill, and that they were in no way the result of the provisions of the Bill itself. The able and amusing speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) was only one more illustration of how much easier declamation was than argument. The whole foundation on which the confis- catory denunciations of the Bill were based was a notion that, in the words of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, it was a measure to enact that the right of the landlord should not be enforced. In reality, the Bill was nothing of the sort. Its object was to make the landlord pay if he were determined to take advantage of the present state of things to obtain possession of his land at all costs and at whatever suffering to the tenant. It was absurd to suppose that under any provision of the Bill a single tenant who could pay would not pay sooner than be evicted and receive the compensation which might be awarded to him. Although he supported the Government Bill, it was impossible not to say that during the last 12 or 18 months the landlords had had very hard measures meted out to them, and were often treated as pariahs of society. Having been the objects of much opprobrium, they were in a state of nervous prostration, and believed that any measure which they considered to be a result of the land agitation must be detrimental to their vital interests. But post hoc was not always propter hoc, and, in his opinion, nothing in the Bill had been prompted by the denunciations of the land agitators. It was all very well to say that most of the Irish landlords were humane men. That, of course, was the case; but, at the same time, it could not be denied that there were a certain number of landlords and agents who might think the present a favourable opportunity for clearing their estates; and no matter how small the proportion might be, even if it was no more than 1 per cent, it was the duty of the Government under the circumstances to interpose. A great deal of wholly unnecessary alarm had prevailed respecting the measure before the House. He believed that it would prevent no reasonable landlord from receiving as full an amount of rent as under the existing law. It would apply only to cases in which payment was impossible. Judging from his own knowledge of Ireland, he should say that there was no Communistic feeling among the peasantry against the payment of rent. On the contrary, the payment of rent was generally regarded almost in the light of a religious duty, except where the agitators had lately stirred up the people, though, no doubt, the object of every tenant was to pay as low a rent as possible. That was a purely natural desire; but, subject to that proviso, the small Irish farmer was ready and willing to meet his engagements. It was to be remembered that under the provisions of the Bill the claim for compensation must come from the tenant and after he was evicted, who, on summoning his landlord for compensation, would have to prove the justice of his case. The onus of proof was thrown on the tenant. It had gravely been suggested that an evicted tenant might obtain compensation and, after paying arrears, might, under his six months' right of redemption, return to his holding with the balance of the compensation money in his pocket. He need not say how absurd it was to imagine that a tenant could keep both holding and compensation; but this was an illustration of the wild and unfounded alarms which the Bill had roused. With regard to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock, hon. Members who, for Party purposes, used such language, had only themselves to thank if the effects of the introduction of the Bill had been in some instances rather unfortunate. He deprecated very strongly the idea that the Bill should not now be passed, because, after the language with which it had been met, the only thing that could convince the people of Ireland as to its real import would be its enactment. He would undertake to say that, if the Bill passed, the Irish tenant would very soon understand that it was not a measure in accordance with the views of agitators, but that it was intended only to throw the ægis of protection over the honest and ill-used farmer. The operation of the Bill would speedily show that the Liberal Party had supported no measure of confiscation. It would reduce, rather than aggravate, the present difficulty; and he trusted that it might be allowed to become law.

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE said, that only one Conservative Irish landlord had spoken in the debate, and that the others, who had waited to hear the reasons for the Bill, had failed to discover them. They found no principle in any of the speeches of the supporters of the Bill, and nothing but pity and compassion for the tenants, combined with an opinion that a fine imposed upon one section of the community would meet the difficulties of the case. On looking at all the circumstances, he was convinced that, though deep distress undoubtedly existed in many parts of Ireland, many prosperous tenants had been prevented from paying their rent by the arts and incitements of agitators. He had heard with pleasure the denunciations of those persons by the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary; but he feared that, all the same, the popular idea in Ireland would be that the Government supported the peasantry in their unlawful agitation against the payment of rent. The speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had astonished him. He regretted that speech, because he thought it likely to have an effect not intended, though he was not much surprised at the somewhat harsh view taken by the right hon. and learned Gentleman of the landlords. If any landlord who improved his property by consolidation was to be blamed as he was blamed, he (Sir H. Hervey Bruce) believed, that evening, then people would be afraid to improve their property in the way in which it was the duty of Irish landlords to do. He feared this Bill would give a great increase of employment to gentlemen of the learned Profession. If it did so, he wished to know whether they would like to wait for two years before they were paid for their services to tenant farmers? Strong expressions had been used against landlords with reference to the advance of money to them, as if it was a boon to them, and as if it was not asked for in order to enable them to act charitably towards poor people by giving them employment. As to the power of eviction, he granted that it was sometimes harshly used; but if that power of eviction were taken away for two years, he was afraid there were a great many people in Ireland who would say there was nothing dishonest in not paying for two years. It would have been a much fairer, more statesmanlike, and more generous plan than this Bill to have legalized over the whole of Ireland a certain amount of the Ulster custom. After adverting to a letter which appeared in The Times that day from one of the largest landlords in Ireland (Mr. King Harman), to whose opinions he said hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway would pay some attention, the hon. Baronet said he would next allude to the conciliatory speeches of the Chief Secretary, who, probably, was almost ashamed of the Bill he had introduced. The right hon. Gentleman used kind language; but he failed to see in his arguments any reason for depriving landlords of the power which they had, and for giving their money to their tenants and to the money-lenders of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman wondered why he (Sir H. Hervey Bruce), who was not in a scheduled district, objected to this Bill. He objected to this Bill because he knew that ill weeds grew apace, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman, or all the talent on the Treasury Bench, would be able to prevent this question of non-payment of rent spreading over all Ireland. He wanted to know in what way would these tenants be better prepared to pay rent at the end of two years than now? He was afraid this Bill was no act of kindness or generosity to the tenants themselves. He feared that it would induce tenants who were able to pay to use their money in other ways, and that when the third year came they would be in a worse condition than they were now. Would the Government, at the end of the two years, find money for people to pay their back rent with; or would the Government permanently fine the landlords for being lenient and kind to their tenants? If no rents were paid, how were landlords to pay taxes, or meet their current expenses? Why should the indulgence proffered be shown to the tenant farmers of the disturbed districts in Ireland, while it was refused to the orderly English tenant farmer? When the latter found himself unable to pay his way, he gave up possession of his land in a peaceful way, whereas the Irish tenant farmer in those districts where agitators had influence tried to avoid paying his rent as long as he could do so safely. Why was this exceptional mercy to be shown to the Irish tenant farmer at the expense of a particular class of the community? In his opinion, it would have been far wiser for the Government to have brought in a measure to extend the Ulster custom to Ireland generally than to have introduced this Bill. A great deal of stress had been laid upon capricious evictions, but he did not believe such evictions were general. In any case, however, it would be better to punish the harsh landlords individually than to punish the good and bad equally. Why had the Government allowed themselves to be influenced by those who had neither law, justice, nor equity on their side—who thought fit to hold up the landlords of Ireland to odium and execration, and who characterized them as the hereditary enemies of the Irish people? The Land Act was the law of the land, and he and those who thought with him desired loyally to obey it; but it contained many unjust and unwise provisions. Thus the provision that abolished freedom of contract between landlord and tenant was a great blot on the statute, and took the people out of the hands of their landlords in order to place them in those of the money-lenders and of the small shopkeepers, who dealt far more hardly by them. If freedom of contract between the Irish landlord and tenant could be restored it would be a most fortunate thing for the country. He was afraid, however, that the views of the Government did not run in that direction. They were willing enough to protect the tenants from their landlords, but they would not protect them from each other. Nothing could be more terrible than the thirst for land which prevailed in Ireland, and which induced the incoming tenant to pay the outgoing tenant 40 years' rent of a farm in order to obtain possession of it as a mere tenant at will. The result was that men got up to their ears in debt merely to obtain possession of a farm which they were powerless to cultivate because they had not sufficient capital. He failed to see how, under the provisions of this Bill, a County Court Judge would be able to decide that the non-payment of rent was caused by the prevailing distress. A short time ago, a well-known Irish agent told him of a case in which a man who had protested that he was unable to pay his rent had, on pressure, produced a roll of notes for an amount far beyond the amount due. In such a case how was it possible for the County Court Judge to decide whether the man was or was not able to pay his rent? On first sight the words of this Bill appeared to be wise, reasonable, and fair; but, looking more narrowly into their meaning, it would be found that they simply offered the tenant a premium not to pay his rent. When the people in Ireland heard it said by hon. Members in that House that they were to keep a firm grip of the land, they would believe the advice, and they would believe, further, that the Bill of the Government would give them that firm grip of the land. Therefore, although the wording of the Bill was good, the spirit was bad; it would lead to bad feeling, and would place the people in a worse position than they were before. It was a step towards Communism, and he would advise hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House to consider well before they passed such a Bill into law. It was said that no complaints were made against the County Court Judges; but who would take the responsibility of complaining? Not the landlords surely, and not the tenants who were liable to be called before those Judges. It was only natural that no complaints on such a subject should ever reach the ear of the Government. The hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) put this simply as a Fixity of Tenure Bill, and he avowed that openly and honestly. He admired the hon. Member's openness and honesty, though he differed from his reasons. The Government did not say they meant fixity of tenure. They said they meant no such thing; but, from the speeches they had heard, it was clear that was the object of those who supported them.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR, interposing, said, the Government did not say that they were not in favour of fixity of tenure. He said nothing either one way or the other.

Sir H. Hervey Bruce

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE, resuming his remarks, observed, that another reason why he objected to the Bill was that it seemed to him to show sympathy with agrarian outrage, and want of sympathy with peace and order. That was where the Bill failed most materially. It said to those who were loyal, and had paid their rents honourably, "We will do nothing for you; we can give nothing to those parts of Ireland that are quiet and peaceful. It is only to those parts which have been rendered disaffected by the eloquence of hon. Members that the Government are applying this Bill." This, he maintained, would unwittingly and unconsciously back up that portion of the people in their habit of committing agrarian crime. It was not much kindness to Irish landlords to allow them to get their property in the same manner that a money-lender recovered debts. He, therefore, failed to see in what respect it would prove the boon it was expected to be. The emigration of small tenants might be productive of good both to themselves and to those they left behind them; but emigration on the lines laid down by the Attorney General for Ireland would simply have the effect of taking all the bone and sinew out of the country—the able-bodied young men and women—and to leave only the old and the decrepid. The junior Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) accused hon. Members on the Opposition Benches of obstructing this Bill. But what was most properly to be called obstruction—the searching criticism applied to this Bill, or the long, drawling speeches by which the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends delayed for 12 hours the progress of another Bill which was designed to relieve distress in Ireland, but which had the misfortune not to be drawn up in exact accordance with their ideas? This Bill, he feared, would starve many landlords out of Ireland; and after they were driven out of their native country by penury and want, it would be hard to bring them back again. Well, he wished the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends who were agitating this question joy of the country if they were themselves to become owners of the land in such circumstances. He, for one, should pity the unfortunate people who would be dependent upon them, after what he had seen of the spirit by which they were actuated in many of their speeches addressed to fellow-subjects with whom they did not happen to agree. The main features of the Bill were, practically speaking, fixity of tenure and non-payment of rent, and the consequences of these the Government would find it very hard to meet. How was the payment of the Income Tax or of the poor rates in the scheduled districts to be made? The Bill, it seemed to him, if carried into law would have the effect of driving the landlords, a set of honourable and hardworking gentlemen, into exile from their native land, and into a state of misery greater than that which the Bill was designed to relieve among the people of Ireland.

MR. NELSON said, it was easy for an hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce), to bring general charges against those who were better acquainted with the condition of Ireland than he was, or was ever likely to be. They had never adopted the principles of Communism, Socialism, or Nihilism, but they defined landlordism as the Shylock of Irish industry. The Bill before the House was, in his humble judgment, only intended to protect those families which the hon. Member for Coleraine had not, like him, seen placed upon the roadside. Where the tenant had effects, and even the small residue of his small crop, the landlord had his remedy and could pay himself. They were only contending for the protection of those poor people who were unable to pay; and if there was a stone of Indian meal in the house, they said that it ought to be given to the children rather than to the rapacity of an agent. This would not be so powerful a cause in the land if it were not a good one, and he would warn those "forcible feeble" Representatives of Irish landlordism, such as the hon. Member for Coleraine, that if they did not listen to warning in time, and accept a conscientious and moderate reform, the hour would come when they would be told to pack up. They wanted, if possible, to do justice to all parties; but as Mayo seemed to be singled out by the hon. Member, and he happened to be the only Representative of that district present for the moment, he begged to say that as they had scheduled several of the Unions there he would say that the poor could not support the poor. That portion of the Western Island on which "the moaning of the Atlantic"

had produced a sort of moaning amongst the people, if their distinguished Leader of the past were to be listened to, was in that condition, and he would tell the House in all sincerity that if they did not remedy distress in Mayo, and Galway, and Leitrim, and Roscommon—aye, and in Ulster—the time would come when the Parliament of England would regret that it had neglected its opportunity. The Bill did nothing but demand protection for an honest man; and he put it to any hon. Member whether, if they had a portion of hard-scraped food, and five or six or seven pale, fasting children looking to them for support, they would not apply it to the support of their offspring. The tenant was, they held, bound by the law of nature and the human conscience to support his family. He had had cases before him where a poor man was thrown on the road-side where the landlord was really in his debt on account gone into to the extent of £150. If justice were done he would go to the length of saying that the land for which this rent was taken was not, in many a case, able to do more than support the family. Some of them would even go to the length of arguing that the rent was the surplus product of a farm, and that it only came in after proper deductions had been made, and the relations of the landlord to the possession of the property ought to be determined by the wants of the family. It was easy for the hon. Member for Coleraine to talk of the tenant right of Ulster being something which the people had purchased. He was there to say that the majority of the acres of Ulster were plundered from the Irish people by an unjust Monarch who talked of God while ruining many. They never could fulfil the conditions of their leases, and the day was not far distant when they would be able to say something like what they would tell the Guilds of London and the Corporation of London. He did not say the cases were identical; but when they would say you have robbed Ireland long enough, and if the Crown had the right to take the land of Ulster, then it had a right to resume it. They were twice taken in the reign of Charles I. or II., and he trusted God would spare the Prime Minister long enough to resume those lands once more, and turn them to the support of the families living upon them. If the landlords of Ireland had

which they were powerless to cultivate because they had not sufficient capital. He failed to see how, under the provisions of this Bill, a County Court Judge would be able to decide that the non-payment of rent was caused by the prevailing distress. A short time ago, a well-known Irish agent told him of a case in which a man who had protested that he was unable to pay his rent had, on pressure, produced a roll of notes for an amount far beyond the amount due. In such a case how was it possible for the County Court Judge to decide whether the man was or was not able to pay his rent? On first sight the words of this Bill appeared to be wise, reasonable, and fair; but, looking more narrowly into their meaning, it would be found that they simply offered the tenant a premium not to pay his rent. When the people in Ireland heard it said by hon. Members in that House that they were to keep a firm grip of the land, they would believe the advice, and they would believe, further, that the Bill of the Government would give them that firm grip of the land. Therefore, although the wording of the Bill was good, the spirit was bad; it would lead to bad feeling, and would place the people in a worse position than they were before. It was a step towards Communism, and he would advise hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House to consider well before they passed such a Bill into law. It was said that no complaints were made against the County Court Judges; but who would take the responsibility of complaining? Not the landlords surely, and not the tenants who were liable to be called before those Judges. It was only natural that no complaints on such a subject should ever reach the ear of the Government. The hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) put this simply as a Fixity of Tenure Bill, and he avowed that openly and honestly. He admired the hon. Member's openness and honesty, though he differed from his reasons. The Government did not say they meant fixity of tenure. They said they meant no such thing; but, from the speeches they had heard, it was clear that was the object of those who supported them.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR, interposing, said, the Government did not say that they were not in favour of fixity of tenure. He said nothing either one way or the other.

Sir H. Hervey Bruce

SIR H. HERVEY BRUCE, resuming his remarks, observed, that another reason why he objected to the Bill was that it seemed to him to show sympathy with agrarian outrage, and want of sympathy with peace and order. That was where the Bill failed most materially. It said to those who were loyal, and had paid their rents honourably, "We will do nothing for you; we can give nothing to those parts of Ireland that are quiet and peaceful. It is only to those parts which have been rendered disaffected by the eloquence of hon. Members that the Government are applying this Bill." This, he maintained, would unwittingly and unconsciously back up that portion of the people in their habit of committing agrarian crime. It was not much kindness to Irish landlords to allow them to get their property in the same manner that a money-lender recovered debts. He, therefore, failed to see in what respect it would prove the boon it was expected to be. The emigration of small tenants might be productive of good both to themselves and to those they left behind them; but emigration on the lines laid down by the Attorney General for Ireland would simply have the effect of taking all the bone and sinew out of the country—the able-bodied young men and women—and to leave only the old and the decrepid. The junior Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) accused hon. Members on the Opposition Benches of obstructing this Bill. But what was most properly to be called obstruction—the searching criticism applied to this Bill, or the long, drawling speeches by which the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends delayed for 12 hours the progress of another Bill which was designed to relieve distress in Ireland, but which had the misfortune not to be drawn up in exact accordance with their ideas? This Bill, he feared, would starve many landlords out of Ireland; and after they were driven out of their native country by penury and want, it would be hard to bring them back again. Well, he wished the hon. Member for Cork and his Friends who were agitating this question joy of the country if they were themselves to become owners of the land in such circumstances. He, for one, should pity the unfortunate people who would be dependent upon them, after what he had seen of the spirit by which they were actuated in many of their speeches addressed to fellow-subjects with whom they did not happen to agree. The main features of the Bill were, practically speaking, fixity of tenure and non-payment of rent, and the consequences of these the Government would find it very hard to meet. How was the payment of the Income Tax or of the poor rates in the scheduled districts to be made? The Bill, it seemed to him, if carried into law would have the effect of driving the landlords, a set of honourable and hardworking gentlemen, into exile from their native land, and into a state of misery greater than that which the Bill was designed to relieve among the people of Ireland.

MR. NELSON said, it was easy for an hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Coleraine (Sir H. Hervey Bruce), to bring general charges against those who were better acquainted with the condition of Ireland than he was, or was ever likely to be. They had never adopted the principles of Communism, Socialism, or Nihilism, but they defined landlordism as the Shylock of Irish industry. The Bill before the House was, in his humble judgment, only intended to protect those families which the hon. Member for Coleraine had not, like him, seen placed upon the roadside. Where the tenant had effects, and even the small residue of his small crop, the landlord had his remedy and could pay himself. They were only contending for the protection of those poor people who were unable to pay; and if there was a stone of Indian meal in the house, they said that it ought to be given to the children rather than to the rapacity of an agent. This would not be so powerful a cause in the land if it were not a good one, and he would warn those "forcible feeble" Representatives of Irish landlordism, such as the hon. Member for Coleraine, that if they did not listen to warning in time, and accept a conscientious and moderate reform, the hour would come when they would be told to pack up. They wanted, if possible, to do justice to all parties; but as Mayo seemed to be singled out by the hon. Member, and he happened to be the only Representative of that district present for the moment, he begged to say that as they had scheduled several of the Unions there he would say that the poor could not support the poor. That portion of the Western Island on which "the moaning of the Atlantic"

had produced a sort of moaning amongst the people, if their distinguished Leader of the past were to be listened to, was in that condition, and he would tell the House in all sincerity that if they did not remedy distress in Mayo, and Galway, and Leitrim, and Roscommon—aye, and in Ulster—the time would come when the Parliament of England would regret that it had neglected its opportunity. The Bill did nothing but demand protection for an honest man; and he put it to any hon. Member whether, if they had a portion of hard-scraped food, and five or six or seven pale, fasting children looking to them for support, they would not apply it to the support of their offspring. The tenant was, they held, bound by the law of nature and the human conscience to support his family. He had had cases before him where a poor man was thrown on the road-side where the landlord was really in his debt on account gone into to the extent of £150. If justice were done he would go to the length of saying that the land for which this rent was taken was not, in many a case, able to do more than support the family. Some of them would even go to the length of arguing that the rent was the surplus product of a farm, and that it only came in after proper deductions had been made, and the relations of the landlord to the possession of the property ought to be determined by the wants of the family. It was easy for the hon. Member for Coleraine to talk of the tenant right of Ulster being something which the people had purchased. He was there to say that the majority of the acres of Ulster were plundered from the Irish people by an unjust Monarch who talked of God while ruining many. They never could fulfil the conditions of their leases, and the day was not far distant when they would be able to say something like what they would tell the Guilds of London and the Corporation of London. He did not say the cases were identical; but when they would say you have robbed Ireland long enough, and if the Crown had the right to take the land of Ulster, then it had a right to resume it. They were twice taken in the reign of Charles I. or II., and he trusted God would spare the Prime Minister long enough to resume those lands once more, and turn them to the support of the families living upon them. If the landlords of Ireland had no better advocates than the hon. Member for Coleraine, he would say their cause was "forcibly feeble."

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT said, it was with great pain that he felt himself bound to separate himself from the Party with which he generally acted and oppose this Bill, which was of an exceptional and anomalous character. He had listened with attention to the speech of the Prime Minister; but he was still of opinion that any argument drawn from the Land Act of 1870 was entirely beside the question. He took objection to the Bill on the ground of principle as well as on the ground of policy and expediency. He could find no precedent in legislation which was in principle exactly analogous to this. It was a measure which offered facilities to a certain class to shelter themselves from their obligations to pay certain creditors, which creditors, in their turn, were not relieved from their responsibility of paying their own debts. The Bill had been accurately described by the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) as intended to meet an emergency. It was a Bill with regard to the distress in certain parts of Ireland to provide compensations to tenants upon failure of their crops. But he would notice, in the first place, that there was a discrepancy between the purport of the Bill and the Schedule attached to it which required explanation. The Bill provided facilities for the avoidance of payment of rent in the districts mentioned in the Schedule. But the area of distress was by no means commensurate with the area of the scheduled districts. It had been said that the Bill only deprived the landlord of one remedy, and that a remedy which was not possessed by landlords in England, while all his other remedies remained intact. That was technically true, but practically delusive. It was true that in this country the power of ejectment did not exist; but a power of re-entry existed, which was practically equivalent to that of ejectment. It had been said, too, that the Bill was limited in time and in the area to which it was applied. But what was likely to be its effect both within and without the limited districts? He would not pronounce a positive opinion; but he did not like to contemplate what would be the state of things on the 1st of January, 1882, when, probably, a large number of evictions would take place. He wondered whether the Government would then think it necessary to pass another Suspensory Bill. It was denied that the effect of the Bill would be to deter capital from Ireland. But he could corroborate the experience of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster, as he knew of instances where the prospect of the Bill's passing had had that effect. It was the first time since he had had a seat in Parliament that he felt himself compelled to separate himself from the Liberal Party; but he was bound in conscience to oppose the Bill.

MR. FITZPATRICK said, that, as one who loved his country he was as anxious as any Irishman could be for its welfare and prosperity; but he believed the Bill would be mischievous and ruinous in its effects. It had been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, but he did not believe it was really his handiwork. If the Bill was intended to prevent destitution, he would ask were the circumstances exceptional? Why, the Secretary to the Treasury had acknowledged that the circumstances were not exceptional. But was the Bill really one to relieve distress, or was it a Bill to establish a peasant proprietary? Or was it merely a sop to agitation, as he believed it to be? But the whole question had been befogged by legal quibbles. This Bill was the work of ignorant hands; and if was brought in with a good motive, those who brought it in were the more to blame for not having first consulted those who could have told them the facts. The Bill would affect not only the landlords but the whole capital of Ireland. It would affect the yeomen, the farmers, and the shopkeepers. Those men embarked all their capital in land whenever they had made a little saving. He was afraid that that class would be absolutely ruined by the Bill. The whole feeling of the country would be one of insecurity. They would be giving the people to understand that they could not rely upon the law which was passed in 1870, and they would create such a feeling of alarm in the minds of all concerned with the land of the country that the whole of the capital to be used, as well as the desire for improvement, would be driven out of the country. But, taking it for granted that it did benefit the men it was intended for, what would be the result of the two years' grace which would be given them? Why, they would be more deeply dipped in debt than ever; and then they were told that force would have to be employed, and that the law would have to be carried out to the utmost. What would be the result of that? The man would resist, and there would be more bloodshed, more trouble, and more misery. They were told by the First Lord of the Treasury that the Law of Distress could be put in force by the landlord; but let hon. Members recollect the operation of the Law of Distress under the Tithe-rent Law. He believed that it resulted in nothing less than practical war between the occupiers and the authorities. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had spoken of emigration as a good thing. Now, there was no doubt that emigration was the only solution of the difficulties of these poor people. ["No, no!"] He could tell hon. Gentlemen that the unfortunate people were only living from hand to mouth. In good times they were labourers in England, and in bad times they were obliged to live on charity and on the rates. He now came to what he believed to be the true test of the Bill. He believed it to be a mere sop to agitators. Was it a right or a good thing to those? They knew the state of the country, in parts of which terrorism of the worst kind existed. He maintained that the present year had done more, and would have done more if they had been let alone, to bring class and class together than ever had been done before. The present year had done much, and would have done still more, if there had not been interference, to bring class and class together. They had seen every class of persons speaking together with the sole object of doing good for the people; in fact, the country had got into such a state that everyone banded together for one common good. But by the passing of the Bill all this would be destroyed, and the country would be brought into a worse state than ever. He would read a letter from Mr. Hussey, a large owner of property in the South and South-West of Ireland, in which he gave his opinion of the Bill of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Mr. Hussey said—

"I have been reading with attention the debate on Mr. Forster's Land Bill, and I venture to trouble you with my opinion on it. I receive rents from about 5,100 tenants, paying about £90,000 a-year, in the districts to be scheduled under Mr. Forster's Land Bill, and in my opinion if it becomes law demanding rent will be a useless formality, and landowners will probably be met by a general combination to demand compensation, which they will wholly be unable to meet; no rents will be paid, and creditors, as in 1846 and 1847, will call in their money and force sales with unusual rapidity; and, in fact, all properties will stand a fair chance of being confiscated. In illustration of this I wish to mention that a friend of mine had agreed to borrow £6,000 on a rental of £2,000 a-year free of charges and Landed Estates Court title; the deeds were drafted; but the moment Mr. Forster's Bill was announced, the lender's solicitor said he would break off and would not lend one shilling on an estate affected by Mr. Forster's Act, no matter how large the margin was; and I have heard of similar cases. And even since the Bill was announced I see plainly that it has affected the tenants, and there is no anxiety on their part to come to a settlement. In conclusion, I beg to say that I am the most extensive land agent in the South of Ireland, and that if the Bill passes and Government do not put a stay on all demands affecting landowners, or do not lend them money to pay the tenants the compensation awarded to them, ruin is inevitable, and the most indulgent landlords will be the first to suffer."

He had also received a letter from Mr. Bentham, of the Standard Assurance Company in Dublin, who said—

"I always had the highest opinion of Mr. Forster's ability, but in this matter he has been completely befooled or otherwise led astray. I have never seen anything in my time of equal importance or danger with this Bill. Even the mere attempt to introduce it, whether it pass or not, is of serious importance, and shows to what length they are prepared to go. But I hope and believe that the sense of the country will be manifested before the second reading, and that the Commons will throw out the Bill if the Government have not the sense to withdraw it. For myself, I am disgusted beyond measure. You know how I have struggled to like everything Irish and to see all that is good in the country. Now I feel quite disheartened. We thought the Land Act, 1870, went quite far enough. At that time all the Scottish Offices sent combined statements of the amount they had on loans in Ireland with a view of persuading Mr. Gladstone to modify some objectionable clauses, which he did. We recognized in that Bill that the landlord might have a difficulty in dealing with the land as a commodity and with their tenants. But we thought it made the rents absolutely secure. This Bill will make them absolutely insecure. Since 1870 I suppose I have lent by my own hand something like £1,250,000 in Ireland. But I have closed my doors, and I have refused to carry out two loans already agreed to where some want of promptitude on the borrower's part (in completing title) gave me the excuse. I am sick of their eternal legislation, and I wish I was out of it. I do not know what the Scotch Companies will do, but I have no doubt strong pressure will be brought on the Government by Scotch Members. I am

was an enunciation on the part of the Government of a novel and tremendous principle—namely, that whenever a bad time came then it should be right to prevent a landlord from recovering his property, and to give the tenant a proprietary right in the soil. In any circumstances, that would be a bad policy for Ireland; in the face of the sinister agitation of last winter, it was a dangerous policy. Time travelled fast, but surely not so fast that they could forget the character of that agitation. Nor could they forget the language that was used, not only in Ireland, but in America. He did not wish to allude to the words of irresponsible agitators; he alluded to speeches which had been made by hon. Gentlemen who had seats in that House. What was the character of that agitation? The language of hon. Gentlemen did not imply that they would be content with an equitable re-adjustment of rent, with a reduction of rent on account of distressed circumstances—that language was an incitement to the people of Ireland to pay no rent at all. It was a claim on behalf of the tenant to proprietary right in the soil; the amount of rent to be assessed by himself. It took the matter entirely outside the range of law and equity, making it a question of appeal to force. Did the right hon. Gentleman believe for one moment that when this Bill was passed, the hon. Member for Mayo would not go to his friends in Ireland and say—“The Government have admitted the principles of this Bill; you have only to agitate a little more and we shall get rid of the landlord and the rent together.” With regard to the position of the landlord in this matter, the right hon. Gentleman said it was not the case that the landlord would be in a worse position than any other creditor. That was true. The landlord would be in the same position as any other creditor. Up to the present time, whether rightly or wrongly, the landlord had been in a better condition than any other creditor, and the Government were proposing to take away from him the means of replacing a bad tenant by a good tenant if he wished to do so. The right hon. Gentleman said these were exceptional times, and that such times required desperate remedies. The figures that were given by the Attorney General for Ireland the other night proved a very sad and distressing state of things in Ireland; but it appeared to him a rather lame conclusion to propose this Bill as a remedy. He could not bring himself to vote against this Bill which had been brought in by the Government. They had a responsibility under the present distressing state of things in Ireland. But he wished the First Lord of the Treasury would make a concession with regard to this Bill, and would consider the condition of the landlords. He had no wish to oppose the Government on this matter, and if he could he would desire to vote for the second reading; but as the Bill at present stood he could not do so. If, as had been said, there was a combination on the part of landlords to consolidate their farms, to add acre to acre, to take advantage of the position of these tenants, there might be some justification for legislation; but no facts had been adduced in support of that statement. At any rate, a more temporary measure, having effect at the end of the year, would have been more advisable, enabling the Government to gauge the distress and see how the case really stood.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he thought that the Bill was entirely consistent with the rights of property, and it was because he considered the House was the proper guardian of those rights that he appealed to the House to support the measure. Comparing the conditions of English agriculture with those of Irish agriculture, he pointed out the wide difference that existed between them in connection with the manner in which improvements had been effected. Writing in 1870, before the passing of the Land Act, Mr. O'Connor Morris, the distinguished Correspondent of The Times, had observed—

“That if the landlords in Ireland had properly discharged their duties the formidable problem of how to compensate the tenant for his improvements without interfering with the rights of property could never have arisen, and the class who had created the wealth of the country would not have found themselves deprived of their legitimate property by dishonest landlords.”

He asked hon. Members whether, when something like a property right had grown up on the part of the tenant, it was reasonable that the latter should be deprived of that right? He saw several hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House who were highly distinguished members of the Royal should be in the same position with respect to damages for evictions for non-payment of rent as the holders of tenancies which existed before 1870. That was a distinct breach of the understanding upon which the Act of 1870 was passed. If this Bill could not be regarded as a temporary measure, neither could it be looked upon as limited in area. How could they deprive tenants in other parts of Ireland of the advantages that were to be conferred on those in the distressed districts? The right hon. Gentleman had said that it was not a question of distress, but a question of right and of justice. The tenants of other districts would take the advice of the hon. Member for Mayo and endeavour to prove their inability to pay their rents, and would ask why they were not to have the same advantages as the tenants in the distressed districts. A friend of his who owned land in the distressed districts told him only last week that he had a letter from his agent, stating that he could not expect to give him during the next two years one shilling from his property in those districts. It might be said that that was an exaggeration of the effect of the Bill; that the County Court Judge would have to decide, and if he decided against the tenant, the tenant would have to pay. But the County Court Judge would have a difficult task in valuing the rents—for that was what it practically came to—and if he decided against the tenant he must have an iron nerve in these troublous times, because the risks of the agent and of the landlord would be transferred to the County Court Judge. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) had said the other day that the Government had only touched the extreme fringe of that question. If that were so, he (Mr. Brand) would like to know what was the kernel of it. The hon. and learned Member seemed to aim at fixity of tenure with fair rents. But the most illustrious men of that House would oppose that measure, because in the debates on the Land Act of 1870 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had exposed with elaboration the absurdity of putting upon an outside authority the duty of valuing rent. The present Bill was identical in principle with the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo, and was not a legitimate extension of the Irish Land Act, but was an application of the principle of the Irish Land Act to a fresh set of cases to which the promoters of that Act promised it should not be applied. The hon. Member for Mayo would be frank enough to say that he accepted the Bill as an instalment, and that he would use it as a lever to make the measure apply permanently and universally over Ireland. The hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Roundell), in defending the Bill, said he took his stand on the Irish Land Act. He did so, too; but he disagreed from the hon. Gentleman in his interpretation of that Act. The justification of the Irish Land Act was that the conditions of the occupancy and tenure of land in Ireland were different from those of England, and that principles of legislation which were applicable to the former country were not applicable to the latter. It was urged that Ireland was a country of small holdings, the occupiers of which were not able to make free contracts with their landlords, and the Irish Land Act limited the interference with freedom of contract to holdings of £50 and under. Again, in England the landlord executed all the repairs, kept the land in perfect condition for the tenant, and thereby a community of interest had arisen between the two; whereas in Ireland there was an absence of that community of interest, while, moreover, there was the sad fact, caused partly by iniquitous legislation and partly by the character of the people, and that there were more people in Ireland than the land could support. Damages for eviction were strictly limited by the First Lord of the Treasury to tenancies which existed at the time of the passing of the Act. This Bill would apply to all tenancies—to tenancies created subsequently to the Act of 1870, to tenancies created at any time. The right hon. Gentleman, in moving for leave to bring in the Irish Land Bill, said—

“With regard to all prospective contracts, it is absolutely necessary that if a landlord evict for non-payment of rent there should not be in the sense of the Bill a disturbance of the tenant by the landlord, for the tenant will disturb himself by non-payment of rent.”—[3 Hansard cxcix. 380-1.]

He (Mr. Brand) contended that this Bill was not a legitimate extension of the Irish Land Act as far as concerned the tenancies created since 1870, but that it was an enunciation on the part of the Government of a novel and tremendous principle—namely, that whenever a bad time came then it should be right to prevent a landlord from recovering his property, and to give the tenant a proprietary right in the soil. In any circumstances, that would be a bad policy for Ireland; in the face of the sinister agitation of last winter, it was a dangerous policy. “That if the landlords in Ireland had properly discharged their duties the formidable problem of how to compensate the tenant for his improvements without interfering with the rights of property could never have arisen, and the class who had created the wealth of the country would not have found themselves deprived of their legitimate property by dishonest landlords.”

He asked hon. Members whether, when something like a property right had grown up on the part of the tenant, it was reasonable that the latter should be deprived of that right? He saw several hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House who were highly distinguished members of the Royal

Agricultural Society, and he would observe that in the year 1878 that Society, assembled at Paris, was anxious to present to the world something like a fair survey of the agricultural position of the United Kingdom; and, in order that that might be perfectly done, they engaged the co-operation of a gentleman who was considered to be the very highest authority on agriculture in Great Britain—Mr. Caird. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen might say "No, no!" but they must not forget the fact that the Report made by Mr. Caird on the Agriculture of the United Kingdom was accepted by the Royal Agricultural Society and by the country as a fair, legitimate, and reasonable Report. In that Report Mr. Caird said that the relation between landlord and tenant in Ireland was altogether different to the relation between landlord and tenant in England and Scotland. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) held that that observation, made as it was by so distinguished an authority, would put on one side all that had been said of the analogy between the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland and the relations of landlord and tenant in England. But, far more important than that, were the concluding words of the Report, upon which he would rest the whole of his case. Mr. Caird said that—

"Circumstances have thus brought about a situation in which the landlord cannot deal with his property with the same freedom as the landlord in England or in Scotland, either in the selection of his tenants or in the fair adjustment of rents, and this has in a great measure arisen from the neglect by the landlord of his duty in not himself executing those indispensable permanent improvements which the tenant is obliged to undertake, and who has thus established for himself a claim of co-partnership in the soil itself."

He contended that that co-partnership was a fact which ought to be admitted and accepted by the Legislature. Mr. Heron, formerly a Member of that House, writing in 1872, said that hundreds and thousands of tenants had been evicted in Ireland, although it was well known that by their labour and industry for years they had permanently increased the value of the land; and he added that on the temporary pressure caused by the Famine the tenant, unable to pay one year's rent, lost a real interest in the land worth many years' rent. There was no doubt that through the legislation of that House a tenant-right did exist all over Ireland. The claim had existed, and did exist, up to the present moment. When the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) talked of a Parliamentary title, and the importance attached to it, he confused the issue, for no one would deny that every one of the estates purchased in the Encumbered Estates Court was purchased with this unslumbering claim of the tenant, which now, because there was an exceptional state of affairs, was again presented to Parliament. That tenant-right claim had been handed down from generations, not one of whom had resigned it. The Act of 1870 solidified the claim, and it was now again embodied in this Bill. The Chairman of Ways and Means had lately contributed a very instructive Paper on the resources of America, and showed by figures which were unmistakable that, owing to the decline of agriculture in Ireland, the food production of that country had greatly decreased; and Professor Baldwin, a gentleman of whom the late Government thought so highly that they placed him upon the Commission of Agriculture, had shown in admirable Reports made to the late Lord Lieutenant that the production of Ireland would be enormously increased if its tillage were extended, instead of diminishing. It had been said that Ireland was over-populated. On the contrary, another 1,000,000 at least might live happily in it. If the population of Ireland were proportionately as thick as that of Jersey—he did not say it ought to be a third of it—she would have 30,000,000 of people. It was because he had studied this question, that he was convinced that this claim on the part of the tenants of Ireland was based on right and justice. Lord Halifax, on the occasion of the former Famine, had said—

"I confess, with pain I can scarcely describe, that the landlords or their agents are pursuing a system of ejectment under process for rent to an extent never before known in this country. If the same course is to be generally pursued, I shall despair of the country being ever relieved."

The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), in speaking against the Bill, declared that no man was ready to go farther than himself in the direction of tenant right. The hon. Member lived in a county, the only English county, found in the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo as was to be found in the Bill of Her Majesty's Government; the differences were merely differences of detail, and there was not a single difference of detail which they would not be told by the Chief Secretary himself they could strike out when they got into Committee. Well, if that were so, was it not demonstration that the principle of the two Bills was the same? This was a kind of Janus-faced Bill. Its principle was for Irish Members, who were not asked to look at the details; its details were for the Whig supporters of the Government, who were asked not on that occasion to look at the principle of the Bill. And what was the attitude of the Third Party? The Irish Party were notable on that occasion for their most eloquent silence. No men were more capable of making eloquent speeches; but there was not one of them who could make a speech more significant or eloquent than in conveying their meaning to the House by their distinguished silence. He hoped the Government would answer this question—Would this Bill have been introduced but for the introduction of the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo? That was a plain question, and it ought to be answered honestly—yes, or no. They talked of great principles and of great necessities, and of the importance of the Bill; but he would bring the matter to this test. If the hon. Member for Mayo had not brought in his Bill, would the Government have brought in theirs? Well, what was the difference between the position of the Government and that of the hon. Member for Mayo? The hon. Member was irresponsible save in the sense of being responsible for the performance of his duty to his constituents. Who were they? They were the people of Mayo, a county which had been impoverished by distress, and, he would add, demoralized by agitation; and the hon. Member took occasion to present the views of his constituents, and he did so by his Bill. But the position of the Government was entirely different. They were distinctly responsible, and when the Prime Minister said it was ridiculous to suggest that he would endeavour to conciliate any of the hon. Gentlemen who sat near the hon. Member for Mayo, and that such a suggestion was unworthy and absurd, the right hon. Gentleman must have thought he was addressing Gentlemen of very little experience and knowledge of the world. The right hon. Gentleman could not be expected to make a grave announcement to the House that he did all this to conciliate the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). Why, the whole conciliation would then be gone. It would be worthless; and if the hon. Member for Cork spoke in the debate he had no doubt he would repudiate the suggestion with indignation. The hon. Member would state that he was not satisfied with the Bill, with the usual addition that it dealt with a mere fringe of the Irish question, and that it would be absurd to say that it was anything like a settlement of it. Well, the Bill was built on the lines of that of the hon. Member for Mayo, and that was the outcome of the agitation prevailing in the county he represented; and it required a lengthened debate to show that it was not an act of spoliation directly traceable to agitation. The Relief of Distress Bill was introduced without the clause, and when it was introduced it was at once knocked out of the Bill. He asked hon. Members frankly, calmly, soberly, to look at the principle of the Bill, and he challenged their judgment with respect to these propositions. Land might be let at a moderate rent; that rent might be in arrear one, two, or three years. The landlord, who had to support himself, rear his children, and meet all his obligations, said to his tenant—"Keep your bargain to me. I am very sorry if you are unable to pay your rent; but give me back my land." That was done every day in England, and no fault was found. But this Bill said to the landlord—"No. Power is given to a Court to decide whether you are or are not unreasonable in your demand, and to mulct you in damages for your audacity if you look for either your rent or your land." These propositions were incapable of contradiction; and the Land Court in its discretion might—he did not say it would—award compensation to the tenant up to seven years of the rent for seeking to recover it. But it was said that the Bill was intended for unreasonable landlords. He would test that in a sentence. It could not be contradicted that on the construction and within the legitimate meaning of the words of the Bill the County Court Judge could award damages against a man who had let his land at the most reasonable rate, and even under the market value. The Judge must award such compensation, and the only course open to the landlord was to go to the Court and adduce arguments or evidence to induce the Judge to mitigate the amount of the damages which he would award. Landlords would not be able to save themselves from the operation of the Bill by saying that they were ready to permit the sale of the goodwill of their farms. This was no condition of the Bill, and could not, therefore, be discussed on the Motion for the second reading, although it might be said that the Land Judge could take the circumstance into his consideration in fixing the sum which should be paid by a landlord for disturbance of his tenant. He had listened to the Prime Minister with great attention, as he always did, and failed to discover anything in contradiction of the principle which he now laid down. It was argued in support of the measure that it was a very little one, and was only intended to apply to distressed districts. An excuse of that kind had been used in other affairs of life. That very statement surely proved the indefensible nature of the proposal. It had been defended on account of the special poverty that overwhelmed certain classes; but its principle was to relieve one class at the expense of another. If the defence of the Bill was that the distress was so great that the Poor Law needed to be supplemented, in the name of common sense he asked why it was that the State did not bear that supplemental charge? It was a rate in aid of the Poor Law levied on one selected class of the community. Why was it on Saturday that the Government said that the existing distress was not great enough to warrant the Treasury in bearing the loss of the difference between the 1 per cent paid by the landlords and the 2½ per cent paid by the Government, although that loss would not exceed £3,000 or £4,000; and yet here, on Monday, they were found urging the extreme character of the distress as a reason for this Bill? The fact was that the Bill would apply the most harsh principle ever submitted to Parliament in a Bill in the harshest possible manner. It had been conceded by every speaker that a proposal of this startling character could only be adopted on evidence of the most overwhelming necessity; but where was that evidence? There was none, and, moreover, the Chief Secretary himself had negatived the possibility of such evidence, for when opposing the Bill of the hon. Member for Cork he stated that there was now a prospect of a good harvest, more employment, and less distress; and that the Government believed that whatever distress did exist it would be within the machinery of the Poor Law to meet it. If the Poor Law could meet it, what justification, he asked, was there for placing this charge upon the poor Irish landlord? Was there no evidence of the condition of the country given in the clear and distinct answer of the Postmaster General the other night? The figures which were then read by the right hon. Gentleman showed that proportionately there was more prosperity among those employed in agriculture than among the landlords upon whom the Bill would impose the additional taxation, there being an increase not only in the amounts deposited in the Savings Banks, but in the number of depositors. That state of things was distinctly traceable to the circumstance that rents had not been paid in many cases by those who had the means of paying them. The measure would ruin many, very many, landlords, and would do very little good to anybody. It would do very little to benefit tenants, whilst its demoralizing tendency had already been widespread, and would, he feared, be irrevocable. Could anyone who had the slightest acquaintance with what was going on in Ireland, who wrote to a single banker, or a single insurance agent—he passed over the landowners, because they were considered outside the pale of the law at present—but could anyone doubt that the ruin caused by this Bill would be widespread, almost universal? [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND: No!] Was it not obvious? [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND: No!] He would invite the right hon. and learned Gentleman to get up and argue his negative. Was it not obvious that the poor landowner—and the majority of them were small—with his family charges, with jointures, with taxes, and with no rents for meeting those charges, would he not be of necessity ruined? If this Bill passed a landlord would have either to forego land, or to borrow money to enable him to pay damages for its recovery. Whence would he get the means? Was the State going to lend to him? This was not in the Bill. Was the Money Market going to lend to him? Not according to the information they had had from Ireland since the introduction of this Bill. If this Bill passed the landlords would practically have to make up their minds that they would get substantially no rent for the next two years. The Prime Minister had gravely told them that the purpose of the Bill was to maintain the principles of property. Well, unless this statement contained a threat, he would say, with all deference, that it was absurd. To take away property, to make it irrecoverable, and then to say that they were thereby maintaining the rights of property was simply absurd, unless, as he said, it contained a threat. What was the threat? Why, "If you do not submit to this exaction we will not protect you in the execution of the processes of the law." Suppose the Bill were not passed, and its principles were not affirmed, did the Government mean to say they were going to let the property of Ireland go by the board, that they were not going to defend the processes of the law? If they did not mean that, he did not understand the proposition that on the second reading of the Bill depended the vindication of the rights of property. If the unfortunate landlord should get judgment in the County Court, would he be sure of getting possession? The cry of the agitation had been "fixity of tenure and fair rents;" but the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had gone further. His cry was, "fixity of tenure and no rents" for two years; or, if the right hon. Gentleman liked it better, no rents recoverable for two years—he did not see much difference—or rents reducible at the option of the tenant. Since this subject had been raised he had received so many letters in reference to it from persons in Ireland that he had made up his mind not to quote any of them; but there was one from an eminent Irish land agent, Mr. Kincaid, which he should be happy to show to the right hon. Gentleman as a specimen. It would give him some plain information about the character of the Bill. ["Read!"] Well, he had no objection to read it. It was as follows:—

"It may be anticipated that the agitation against the payment of rent which was carried on all last winter will be continued after harvest, and will be greatly strengthened by the hasty legislation now proposed; the result will be the complete demoralization of the tenants in the West of Ireland, and it will be impossible to collect rents in the ordinary way. The landlords, having already exhausted the forbearance of their creditors, will be totally unable to meet the accumulating claims on their estates. Mortgagees will file petitions for the sale of the encumbered estates, and great expense will be incurred in the first instance. Unless matters improve, sales will be pressed forward as they were in 1850 and 1851, and enormous sacrifice of property will again be made."

They were told that the Bill was by no means designed to conciliate the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). If that were so, some persons connected with the hon. Member for Cork must have been inspired with a spirit of very intelligent prophecy. Mr. Michael Davitt, a gentleman not generally understood to be in the confidence of the Prime Minister, writing to an Irish paper—The Irish World—so long ago as the 22nd of April last, used these remarkable words—

"A measure is to be introduced on the opening of Parliament to suspend the power of evictions. Moreover, a Commission is to be demanded invested with plenary powers to disestablish the London Irish Land Companies, with the absentee and rackrenting landlords. The Land Question in all its phases is now the great issue, and it will not be put down until it is settled on a basis of eternal justice. The friends of the cause are determined to push action in Ireland, and to continue this action on the lines of 'the land for the people and utter destruction of rent and feudalism!'"

The right hon. Gentleman told the House that the object of the Bill was to preserve property, and that it contained a promise or an engagement. He asked what promise, what engagement? Now, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman had no sympathy with the agitation on the subject; but it was, he thought, deeply to be deplored that a statesman occupying his position had said nothing to that effect throughout the whole of his speech. He had listened to the right hon. Gentleman attentively, and from beginning to end he had not uttered a single word to deprecate the continuance of agitation. It was much to be regretted, he thought, that he had not used a solitary expression which could be afterwards quoted by the friends of law and order in Ireland. But was the Bill, he would ask, calculated to confer any real benefit on the tenant? It either went too far or not far enough. There were other creditors besides the landlord. Mr. King-Harman, in a letter which appeared in The Times that morning, said—

“On my own property I can cite several cases where cows given by me to struggling tenants were almost immediately seized by their shopkeeper creditors.”

It seemed, therefore, that while other creditors might pursue their rights to the utmost, the landlords were the only class who were to be left without a remedy. Many landlords had, he might add, held their hands even without being asked, and now they were told that they had done so in vain, and that the present Bill was introduced because they could not be trusted. The excuse was that it was only intended to provide against the bad landlords; but the bad landlords took care of themselves. They did not allow their rents to fall into arrear, and when they did fall into arrear they secured themselves either by means of ejectment or otherwise. The good landlords, however, who allowed two or three years' rent to remain over, were now to be sacrificed because they had shown a charitable disposition. It was, in short, proposed to legislate against the vast majority of Irish landlords, because it was said a handful of them were not good. A most able man, Sir Charles Trevelyan, had stated of the Hares and Rabbits Bill that it was the most indefensible measure which had been submitted to the House of Commons in the present generation. The description would well apply to this Bill. He might further observe that decrees had been in many cases stayed in Ireland either by consent of the landlord or by the operation of the Judge, who was at present clothed with the utmost jurisdiction to stay the execution of ejectment decrees as long as he thought proper. At the last Land Sessions the County Court Judge delayed the execution of the ejectment on his own motion until after January. But one County Court Judge, at all events, had not felt himself at liberty to put any stay on his decree since the introduction of the present Bill, because the landlord might be brought within the operation of the measure and ruined. Upon what was the Bill based by the Government? Figures?

Figures were a mere afterthought. Statistics did not cause the Bill. It was the Bill which caused the statistics. Had any hon. Member any figures before him by which to justify such a measure as this? The right hon. Gentleman, when he produced the Bill, had not a single figure on the Table to justify his action. He did not blame the right hon. Gentleman for not having any figures there, for the whole thing was got up in a hurry. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) came to speak, it appeared that he had been foraging for figures on his own account, and had sent telegrams to the sheriffs of five different counties in Ireland for information. And it was upon the hasty figures of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the speculative figures of the Attorney General for Ireland, that the House was asked to say that there was ground for passing the Bill. Of course, there had been an increase in the number of ejectments. How could it have been otherwise, when many rents had been due for two or three years? Could a contrary state of things have been expected in the face of the great anti-rent agitation, which preached to the tenant not to pay his rent? [Cheers, and cries of "No!"]

MR. FINIGAN rose to Order. Was it just, he asked, or in Order, for any right hon. or hon. Gentleman to assert what was not correct?

MR. SPEAKER not rising,

MR. GIBSON explained that, at all events, the agitation was called “the anti-rent agitation.” He supposed that that title must, at least, have suggested to the tenants to pay only such rent as they themselves should think reasonable. Everybody who read the Irish papers knew that on some occasions the tenants on rent days had appeared in numbers, so as to lend one another courage, and announced that they could not and would not pay. Other cases there were where good and honest tenants had gone quietly to the agent, when no one was looking, and asked for service of notice of ejectment, in order to have an excuse for paying their rent. Landlords had submitted, not only to reduction, but to having no rent at all, and they had enough to bear in the present distress without being assailed and vilified. He was very sorry that his right hon. and learned Friend had thought it to be his duty to assail them by such statements as that—

“They proceeded, with a view to consolidate their farms, to enforce their pound of flesh, and to add farm to farm, in order to grow sheep instead of men.”

There was not a particle of foundation for such a statement. The assertion was one that was incapable of being proved, and which he challenged anyone to prove. The Government might introduce a Bill to take away the property of Irish landlords; but their characters might surely be left untouched. He had two witnesses for the landlords of Ireland, who gave their evidence before the production of the Bill, and upon whose evidence he relied to rebut the imputations made against the landlords. One of those witnesses was the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council (Earl Spencer), who said—

“Many landlords were ready to make abatement to the extent of from 25 to 30 per cent; but they were discouraged in their intentions to adopt that considerate course. For his part, he felt bound to protest against the doctrine which he had heard from time to time that the landlords, as a class, were harsh to their tenants, and he could not for a moment believe that that allegation could be proved.”

Who was his other witness? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary himself, who said, in the debate on the Report of the Address, when he was not thinking of this Bill, that—

“He had no proof himself that there was any desire on the part of the landlords of Ireland to take advantage of the present distressed condition of the tenantry to enforce their rents; and he should deeply lament it if that should be the case. He should consider that harsh conduct on their part at any time, and more especially in a season of distress, like the present, would call for the moral reprobation of the people of these Islands. But he must beg the hon. Gentleman (Mr. O'Donnell), and those who sat with him, to remember the responsible position of the Executive Government. If the existing law were allowed to be disobeyed in one case, it would be disobeyed in many cases, if not in all. It was impossible, even for those who were very anxious to reform the laws, to allow them to be trampled under foot, and to be defied. An illustration was presented by the case of a process server, serving processes, under circumstances of which he knew nothing, who had been stopped and searched, and robbed of a number of processes, those for debt being ten times the number of those for rent. That showed that, if the Government were to allow the recovery for rent to be defied, it would soon be impossible to recover any debt at all.”

It was rather hard, in the face of that statement from the right hon. Gentleman, that these imputations should be cast upon the landlords. The increase in the number of eviction processes had been one of the results of the anti-rent agitation. At the last Spring Assizes two sets of prisoners in Mayo and Galway, who were found guilty by the jury of interfering with the service of the Queen's process, were recommended to mercy, not on the ground that their landlords were harsh, but because they had been misled by bad advice. The remedy of the Government for diminishing the number of process services, and getting rid of the expense of maintaining the police, was to prevent the landlords recovering their rent. It was said that the present law in Ireland was unfair, and favourable to the Irish landlords. He was glad of the opportunity of explaining, meeting, and refuting this statement. That was a most extraordinary statement. The right hon. Gentleman had said that that Act was passed behind the backs of the Irish people. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten that that Act was passed in the year 1860 by a Cabinet of which he was a distinguished ornament. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I alluded to the Act which was passed in 1851.] That did not help the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman went back nine years, and said that that “peculiar” Act was passed in 1851. But that peculiar Act of 1851 was amended and consolidated in the year 1860, and the Act of 1851 was worked under the procedure established by the Act of 1860, which was passed by the right hon. Gentleman, and it was under that Act that these ejectments for non-payment of rent were established. Why had the right hon. Gentleman not done away with that peculiar Act, instead of amending and consolidating it? But the law of 1860 was not a peculiar law. It simplified and cheapened procedure, and saved money both to the landlord and the tenant. In particular, it saved the tenant from great cost, and simplified everything. It gave to the tenant this right—that in no circumstances could more than one year's rent be recovered by distress. There was also another advantage for the tenant. The tenant had the right given him, by a simple and summary process, of redeeming his farm within six months of being evicted. There was a summary remedy of a cheap character which might be resorted to at the cost of a few shillings or a few pounds. Within six months, by a summary application either in the County Courts or before a superior Judge, the tenant might, on payment of the rent and costs, get back full possession of his tenancy, and compel the landlord to account. But he believed that the great majority of landlords did not bring ejectments until considerably more than one year's rent was due. The vast majority of evictions were for more than one year; many of them were for two years', and many even for three years' arrears. Then they were told that the landlord must seize the tenant's goods instead of ejecting. That was the alternative which was offered. But there was nothing to seize. Then, again, it was said, Let the landlord sell the tenant's interest in his farm. But then the tenant would be in a worse position than ever. It was also urged that the landlord should exercise the same powers as were employed by English landlords. But he denied that they had those powers. In England the landlord could distrain for several years' rent; in Ireland he was limited to one year. And if the landlord served a notice of ejectment, although there might be three years' rent due, the tenant would at once claim the benefit of the disturbance clauses of the Land Act. How, then, could the landlord in Ireland be put in the same position as he occupied in England? No two cases could be more dissimilar. Then there was the right of redemption possessed in Ireland, which had been passed over in the debate, and under which the Bill could do a monstrous injustice. Suppose a tenant had been evicted after two years' arrears of rent had accumulated; the tenant might get compensation for disturbance, and say that the compensation had wiped out the arrears, and bid his landlord good morning. That was what would happen in case after case. He had supposed two years' rent due; but if there were three years' rent awarded as damages, and the tenant was then permitted to redeem, the landlord would have to leave the tenant in possession, and give him one year's rent. How was a landlord to disprove the statements made by a tenant, and how was a County Court Judge, who was not a

witch, to find out that a tenant who said he was not able to pay was able to discharge the debt due to the landlord? Then it came to this—that a tenant who was unable to pay, or who said he was unable to pay, could state to his landlord—"Oh, you are very unreasonable if, when I am not paying you the rent I contracted to pay, you are not satisfied with my promise that I shall pay you a smaller rent in the future." Was it reasonable for a landlord to accept that? He must be satisfied with the promise, or be punished for being unreasonable. That was the meaning of what the Chief Secretary said. It seemed to him a startling proposition. If a tenant refused to pay now, and promised to pay a smaller rent in the future, it would be, under this Bill, unreasonable for the landlord to refuse to accept this promise. In other words—"No rent now, and a promise to pay less rent at a future time." He utterly denied that the principle of this Bill was to be found in the Land Act of 1870. This Bill was a violation of the Land Act, its principle and its exceptions; and he might refer to the speeches of the then Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) to show that ejectments for non-payment of rent were not disturbances under that Act, except in two cases—first, in old tenancies where there were arrears handed down from the Famine time; and, second, where certain lettings were made at exorbitant rent. How, then, could it be argued, on any wonderful Darwinian theory, that the germs of this Bill were contained in the Land Act? What had been dealt with by exception in the Land Act was the sole principle of that Bill, and that exception had been expressly introduced because it was stated that there had been an injustice in the landlords holding over stale demands and claiming exorbitant rents. What injustice could be suggested now against the landlords to warrant their being treated in the same way as the landlords who were open to those observations at the time of the passing of the Land Act? Then it was said that this measure was a small one, circumscribed both in time and in place, and that it would not do much harm. But its principle was large, its limitations were entirely illogical, and, like everything illogical, must sooner or later stand condemned. There was absolutely no consistent principle on which they could stop in such legislation short of this—that where one of two parties to a contract was innocently unable to perform his share of that contract, the other party should be obliged either to perform his share of it or to compensate him for his non-performance. That was a very strong proposition. The measure was said to be small; but was not that the history of the first introduction of all dangerous principles—were they not in the first instance always moderate? No wise advocate of such a principle would ever present it at the beginning in its real proportions. It would be enough for him, partly by hiding in its details the true character of the measure, partly by fixing attention on the pressing necessity which was to be its excuse and justification, and, not least, by dwelling on the smallness of the effect to be accomplished by it, if he could induce men to admit, unconsciously it might be, the principle which was so important. Then, when the legislator of the day came to introduce the permanent measure which had been alluded to, the House would be startled when they recognized clearly its principle; but they would be told that their objection to it was too late, and that they had already admitted it. The leading journal, in writing on the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo, described it as a measure which involved in a few lines a scheme of the most dangerous confiscation. He must really borrow those words to describe the Bill now before the House. When the right hon. Gentleman came to understand and realize, as he probably now did, the true bearing and effect of his Bill, he could hardly envy his reflections. The right hon. Gentleman had unquestionably ruined, or, at all events, unquestionably he would ruin, hundreds of landlords. He would break up many of their homes, and reduce many of their families to great distress and suffering without in the slightest degree rendering their tenants more contented. He had lowered the value of landed property in Ireland as an investment by hundreds of thousands, and even by millions of pounds. He had made it hardly available at all as a security; and he had encouraged agitation, though, doubtless, unintentionally, yet not less certainly. That agitation might have abated with a favourable harvest and with returning prosperity; but the right hon. Gentleman had unquestionably given it a revival and a stimulus by adopting, possibly unwittingly, some of its principles, and one, at least of its measures. The agitators would, he thought, disregard the good advice and the cautious words which had been offered to them, and would concentrate their attention on the concessions they had obtained. He believed that those who were principally interested were, as he had said, the Irish landlords of the poorest districts. He hoped it was not too late to re-consider that measure. He admitted that the Government had a vast majority behind them; but surely they were numerous enough to be strong, and strong enough to be just. The Irish landlords, many of whom were constituents of his, had but few direct Representatives in that House. All they could hope for was that every Member in the House would, as far as he could, make their case his own; that they would consider their case with all the love of fair play which had ever characterized the British House of Commons. If they considered that case from the point of view he had suggested, he hoped they would refrain from giving a second reading to a Bill which was opposed to all the principles of sound legislation, and which would assuredly tend to the demoralization of the nation and the encouragement of a feeling opposed to honour, honesty, and justice.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have no pretension and no desire, and I feel if I had a desire I have not the ability, to sum up this protracted debate, or even to follow the able speech which has just been delivered by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who is so well qualified to enter upon all the aspects of the question. But the House will, I think, allow me to say a few words, before they divide, in very brief explanation of the reasons which induce me to support the Bill. I think I need scarcely assure the House that I have no predisposition to support exceptional legislation as regards Irish land tenure, or any extension of the principles of the Irish Land Act without full and complete consideration. I believe I can appeal to hon. Members who sat in the last Parliament, whether in or out of the House I have said one word to encourage that agitation, and those proposals which I believe to be mischievous, which I think injurious to the true interests of the Irish tenantry, and to the Irish landlords. I can assure the House that nothing would induce me to support any proposals of this kind but the strong conviction which is entertained by the Irish Government, by those who are now responsible, as hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite are not, for the peace of Ireland, that a measure of this sort is necessary. But I think I can show that this Bill can be justified, not only by the responsible authority of the Government, but by its own provisions and its own internal justice. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down rested for a long time, at the beginning of his speech, upon the circumstance that this measure was not brought forward by my right hon. Friend at the opening of the Session, but that it was delayed till the introduction of the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo. Sir, my right hon. Friend and his Colleagues are not altogether, or solely, responsible for this, for they had not at the commencement of this Session, and could not have, entirely mastered the affairs of the country which they have to govern. Upon very short notice Her Majesty's Government has had to deal with some very difficult questions, and with a state of things of extreme complexity and difficulty in Ireland. A great part of this discussion has very naturally turned upon the Land Act of 1870. I have no intention of going into the discussion of that Act now. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down said he would urge nothing against that Act; but that course has not been taken by all who sit on the other side of the Table. What was the speech of the hon. Gentleman who moved the rejection of the measure (Mr. Chaplin)? It was a denunciation of the main principle of the Act of 1870, and many hon. Members who have opposed the Bill have done so on the same ground as they did, or would, have opposed the Act of 1870. The speech of my hon. Friend was nothing but an assertion in most unqualified terms of the rights of landlords to the disposal of the soil, and to the disposal of the interest of all connected with the soil. In the opinion of my hon. Friend, the privilege of occupying land is conferred solely by the landlord, and he admits no right but that of the landlord, while he holds that the right of the tenant to exist on the land is conferred solely by the landlord; and, therefore, in his opinion, any failure whatever to comply with the conditions upon which that privilege has been granted justly forfeits every claim which the tenant may be supposed to possess. Some Members, like the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand), and the hon. and gallant Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote), profess themselves favourable to the principles of the Land Act, but oppose this Bill as being a contravention of its principles. I, on the contrary, assert that, so far from being any contravention of the principles of that Act, this measure has been framed simply with the view of preventing the objects of that Act from being defeated. The Land Act is upon its trial; and I have often said on previous occasions that I thought the time had arrived, or would soon arrive, when its results could be ascertained, and that Parliament could form an opinion as to how far its objects had been accomplished. Whatever those results may have been, all I can say is that I believe that the intention of that measure was just and equitable; it being to compel the small minority of Irish landlords to deal out some small measure of that justice to their tenants that the majority of landlords in that country did. Its intention, also, was to give the whole of the Irish tenantry the security—and the sense of security—which the great majority of them already enjoyed, and not only to give it to them practically, but to make them feel that they possessed it. I believe that that object was a just, and equitable, and a worthy object. How far that object has been accomplished, how far it has failed, and how far such failure is due to any defects in that Act, I am not going to say at the present moment. But I may say that I do not think that the measure has had fair play from any party in Ireland. It has been exposed, on the one hand, to attacks from those who object to its objects, and who have sought to evade its provisions; while, on the other hand, it has never conciliated, and it was never intended to conciliate, the extreme advocates of tenant right, or those who have exhorted the Irish tenantry to be satisfied with nothing less than the virtual possession of the soil. I will admit at once that much has occurred lately in Ireland that will not inspire Parliament with any strong desire to proceed much further in the direction of exceptional legislation, or in departing still more from the strictest principles of political economy. Neither can I anticipate what the results of the inquiry into the working of the Statute may be—whether it may show the necessity of extending or restricting the operation of the Act. The duty of a Government, at the present moment, pending the full consideration of the subject by Parliament, is to prevent, so far as possible, the intention and object of the Act from being defeated by exceptional circumstances which could not possibly be foreseen. It cannot be denied that exceptional circumstances do exist, which have enabled landlords, who have been so disposed, to defeat the main object and purpose of the Act. The principal object of the Act was, as I have already stated, to give security to the tenant, subject, of course, to the payment by him of reasonable rent; but the bad harvests which have prevailed in this country, and still more so in Ireland, have rendered the payment of a reasonable rent in that country an impossibility. Almost all over England the landlords have most willingly submitted to a reduction of rent; but the bad harvests, which in England have produced partial failure of the crops, have in Ireland produced an almost total failure. In some parts of Ireland the impoverished circumstances of the tenant have placed in the hands of the landlord a weapon which the Government never contemplated, and which has enabled the landlord, at a sacrifice of a half or a quarter of a year's rent, to clear his estate of hundreds of tenants, whom, in ordinary circumstances, he would not have been able to remove, except upon payment of a heavy pecuniary fine. I ask whether that is not a weapon calculated to enable landlords absolutely to defeat the main purposes of the Act? Supposing a landlord wished to clear his estate of a number of small tenants, he knows that this is the time to do it; and if he should lose this opportunity, he can never have it again without a great pecuniary sacrifice. Therefore, the exceptional circumstances of the times have placed in the hands of bad landlords in Ireland—and such there are—a power which will enable them absolutely to defeat the purposes of the Land Act of 1870. Well, Sir, that is the main object which the present Bill is intended to meet. The

Bill has, it is true, a further object, subsidiary to that which I have stated. Its further object is to compel a hard landlord, if he be forced to proceed to the extreme measure of eviction for the purpose of recovering rent, to use some of that moderation and patience which the great majority of landlords do extend to tenants under such circumstances; and if extreme measures are resorted to, to force him to mitigate the severity to the tenant by those means which are well known on every estate in Ireland where a small tenantry exists. If it can be shown in Committee that the provisions of the Bill go further than is necessary for securing those objects, I believe my right hon. Friend will be ready to consider any Amendment which may be proposed in that sense. But I believe the provisions of the Bill are adequate, and not more than adequate, for the accomplishment of the objects I have stated. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who last spoke attempted to show at great length that the passing of this Bill will lead to a general refusal to pay rent. I do not think, however, that a careful examination of the provisions of the Bill will lead to any such conclusions. What are the grounds for such an assertion? The landlord is left in possession of every power which he ever possessed, including the power of eviction for non-payment of rent, which was given him by the Acts of 1851 and 1860. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote) is entirely in error in supposing that the landlord will be deprived of the power of eviction for non-payment of rent. My hon. and gallant Friend seems to suppose that the landlord will have to go to a Court before he can resort to that remedy. In point of fact, the landlord may use his power of eviction against the tenant; but the tenant will subsequently be able to take the landlord into Court. I say, then, that the landlord is left in possession of every power which any Act of Parliament has ever given him. This Act enables the tenant to make a claim. The Bill provides that in order to make the claim, and to get anything under that claim, the tenant must prove his claim to the satisfaction of the Judge. It is not sufficient to make the claim—he is not judge of his own case—but he must prove his case to the satisfaction of the Court or Judge. The more you look at the provisions of the Bill you will see that it is for the tenant to bring the landlord into Court; but if the landlord can show that he has been actuated by one particle of moderation and forbearance towards the tenant—such as every good landlord exercises—then the case of the tenant fails. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has stated that he did not believe that the provisions of the Act would sufficiently protect landlords' interests. I am disposed to think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is in error; but, at all events, I have not the slightest doubt that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will be willing to make that perfectly clear in Committee. We are told that there will be a general refusal to pay rent in consequence of this Bill. What a monstrous supposition that is. Is it to be supposed that the tenantry of Ireland, whose one great desire is, as everybody knows, to remain in possession of their holdings, are going to refuse to pay rent, and run the risk of eviction, on the chance of being able to prove, to the satisfaction of the Judge, a case against their landlords? That supposition appears to me to be monstrous. I put aside the allegations, so freely made to-night, that the Irish tenants are unwilling to pay their rents. I believe the contrary to be the fact; and most of the Irish landlords will bear witness that rents, even without the pressure of penalty or proceedings, are as well paid in ordinarily prosperous times as they are in England or Scotland. But, supposing that the tenants are really as unwilling to pay their rents as they are said to be, I say it is perfectly idle to suppose that they will run the tremendous risk of eviction from the holdings which it is their chief desire to occupy, upon the mere chance of being compensated. We are told also that the County Court Judges, who are to hear these cases, are likely to be prejudiced in favour of the tenants, and that they will not arrive at a just decision in these cases. That is a very serious and unfounded allegation against those who have to administer justice in Ireland. So far as I know, that assertion has not been supported by one particle of proof. Now, who are the County Court Judges, and the Chairmen of Sessions, who are to hear these cases? They are learned gentlemen engaged in the administration of justice in Ireland, who have practised in the high Courts of Law, and who are acquainted with the principles of justice and the rules of evidence. They are gentlemen who are engaged, to a very great extent, in the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland. On what does the security of property and order in Ireland rest, if not on the impartiality and ability of the Judges who administer the law? And how can it be supposed that the people of Ireland will respect the administration of the Criminal Law if you come forward in Parliament and tell us that the barristers who have been selected for the administration of the Civil and Criminal Law are men upon whose impartiality you cannot rely, and whose justice and ability you distrust? It is useless to deny, as has been pointed out by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, that in many parts of Ireland the administration of the law of property depends, in a very great degree, upon the employment of force. My right hon. Friend described the number of police, sometimes supported by the military, which it is necessary to employ in aid of those engaged in process serving, or in carrying out evictions in Ireland. When the employment of force is necessary it is impossible for a Government to perfectly divest itself of all discretion. During my official connection with Ireland the Government had to exercise its discretion. I admit that in the face of a dangerous agitation, such as that which has, in my opinion, prevailed for some time past in Ireland, it is necessary for the law to be carried out by the Executive with more than usual firmness. It is desirable, however, that the administration of the Executive Government should be limited as much as possible, and that the discretion of the Executive should be controlled as far as may be by the intervention of the Courts of Law. My right hon. Friend has said that he is prepared to carry the law into execution; but it is impossible for any Government to carry out the law, unless it is satisfied that it is acting in obedience not only to law, but to justice and right; and it is in order that the Executive Government may have that conviction that my right hon. Friend is asking you to pass this Bill. I will not deny what has been asserted so frequently by hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the introduction of the measure has caused in Ireland considerable panic and alarm. A great many of the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite have dwelt upon this topic, and letters of a most alarming description have been read; but it is difficult indeed to know how much authority ought to be attached to letters of that sort. Still, I will not deny the existence of a very considerable feeling of alarm. The question, however, is not whether the alarm exists, but whether it is reasonable or not. I think we have shown that it is, to a great extent, an exaggerated alarm; and we must remember that the people of Ireland are an excitable people, and that this excitability is not confined to the lower class of the tenants. At all events, those who are spreading this cry of alarm and panic to the utmost of their power are doing all that they can to bring about the fulfilment of their own predictions. If you insist that this Bill is a Bill to suspend payment for rent—which I have endeavoured to show it is far from being—if you insist upon telling the tenants that Parliament and the Government do not desire that they should pay any rent for the next two years—can you be very much surprised if the tenants believe it? It is quite possible that an alarm such as has been described may exist. There are circumstances in which two violent and opposing parties, acting from different motives, neither of them possessing the power to carry into execution their own opinions, nevertheless combine together to produce such a state of things as realize all the worst expectations formed of the policy of the other by either Party. There seems to me to be much apprehension that such a state of things exists at present in Ireland. Both agitators and landlords are combining together to produce a state of distrust, agitation, and want of confidence. I see no remedy for such a state of things unless Parliament will prove to the people of Ireland that it has more confidence than seems to be possessed by the Leaders of either Party in the honesty of the Irish tenantry, in the impartial administration of justice, and in the firmness of the Executive Government.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I shall not stand many minutes between this House and the division; indeed, after the very powerful and able speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), I should scarcely have thought it necessary to say anything at all if it had not been for some concluding observations of the noble Lord. The noble Lord complains that this Bill, and the Government in respect of the Bill, are in the unhappy position of being misunderstood. He argues very strongly that we, who are misrepresenting the character of the Bill, are, to a great extent, responsible for the alarm which it may occasion. I wish to say that if this Bill and the intentions of the Government really are misunderstood, it is they who have to thank themselves for it. But although I am bound to say that I consider the Bill in itself to be objectionable, what is far more objectionable, in my opinion, is the manner in which it has been brought forward, and the arguments which have been used to support it. For there are two ways in which you may look at it, and two grounds upon which a measure of this kind may be defended. First, on the ground that the Land Act of 1870 requires amendment. If it could have been shown upon a calm investigation, and by evidence which would carry with it a certain amount of weight, that the Act of 1870 was defective, that might have led to the production of a measure of a permanent character, which would have effected an amendment of the Act, which has been in existence during the last ten years. But that has not been the ground taken. It has been put forward very prominently by the Chief Secretary, by the Prime Minister, and now by the noble Lord, that it is necessary to pass a Bill of this sort in heat and haste in order to avoid breaches of the peace. They say that it is necessary for the maintenance of order to avoid what has been called a local civil war, to prevent the break down altogether of the system of law in Ireland that we should give way to an agitation which threatens to be formidable. Now, I venture to say that is about the most dangerous argument that could be pressed upon us. When we are told that this is a small measure, and that it will have no very mischievous consequences, I say that, brought forward as it has been and justified as it has been, it contains the seeds of the very gravest danger. The noble Lord does not suppose that the passing of such a Bill will lead Irish tenants to repudiate the payment of their rents. But, if it is understood by Irish tenants and agitators that by agitating enough, and resisting the payment of rent, they will induce the Government of the day to come forward and make concessions, nothing is more likely than that they will do so. When the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the Bill as limited in point of time and area, how can he possibly say—"Up to this line the tenant shall be entitled to compensation for disturbance, though ejected for non-payment of rent, and beyond this line he shall not have that privilege?" The right hon. Gentleman, when describing the condition of the Ulster district and the district adjoining, made use of that argument. He pointed out that such a distinction would be most arbitrary, and would not give satisfaction. I say precisely the same as to the distinction which the Bill draws between scheduled and non-scheduled districts. It could not be maintained. And so with regard to the limit of time. There will always be a time when some men will not be in a position, from circumstances over which they have no control, to pay their rent; and they would say, according to the principle embodied in your legislation of 1880—"You ought to give us the advantage of that legislation." These arguments will not bear examination; and if this measure had not been suddenly taken up, following the leading of the hon. Member for Mayo, and in consequence of a fear of agitation in Ireland, we never should have had such arguments presented to us. If this measure is required it ought to have been established on careful and full consideration. For remember with what a delicate subject you are dealing. The noble Lord says, one great object of the Land Act was to establish confidence in the mind of the tenant. Is it not necessary that there should also be confidence in the minds of the landlords? In a country that wants capital, confidence is required to enable capital to be introduced into it. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spoke of observations that were made with regard to solicitors advising their clients not to advance money on Irish estates, and he says that has always been the case, except during the last few years. But why does he except the last few years? I will tell him. There has, I believe, been growing up of late a greater amount of confidence in the value of Irish property. It has been thought that the Land Act of 1870 was valuable as a settlement. But now you are going to disturb that settlement, and the consequence will be that you will shock confidence; and let me add that that shock will be doubly serious if it be announced that the ground on which the Act is not to be maintained is, lest its maintenance should lead to disturbance and confusion in the country. We may hereafter have discussions more in detail, for it is thrown out, after all, that this measure has not been so seriously considered as, in some parts, it ought to have been. But the question before us now is a question of principle, on which the House ought not to shrink from pronouncing its opinion.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the House ought not to fear to pronounce an opinion, notwithstanding the alarming representations that have been made—representations which appear to me to be exaggerated beyond anything I have ever heard in this House, and which are calculated to alarm capitalists likely to invest money in Ireland. I have had to do with the lending and the borrowing of money, and I have discovered that when a borrower goes to a lender, the lender is very ready to believe him when he speaks of his own insolvency, but rather doubtful whether he should give him full credit when he speaks of his solvency. When these statements are made that different societies are unwilling to lend money in Ireland, they must be coupled with the exaggerated statements made as to the effects of this Bill. I should be quite content to let the case depend upon the speeches of the Prime Minister and the noble Lord who has been Chief Secretary for Ireland, and who, therefore, knows something by experience of Irish affairs, were it not for the special reference which the right hon. Gentleman made to myself. His opposition to the Bill was of a very different character from that of the late Attorney General for Ireland. He said it was not so much the Bill which he objected to as the arguments in support of it. He put into my mouth an argument I never used, and which I never should use. I never said—and no Member of the Government has said—that we brought forward this Bill because we could not keep the peace of the country without it. We know it is our duty to keep the peace of the country. We know we must make the law obeyed. We are determined to do our utmost towards attaining that end. As far as my experience has gone I have succeeded in getting process serving conducted with less resistance than previously, because I have sent a large force with the process servers, showing that we are determined that the law shall be obeyed. It is not that we want this amendment of the law in order to make the law obeyed in Ireland; the whole power of this country is behind us in doing that; but it is because we wish to be able to enforce that law, and to use that tremendous power, perhaps, at the cost of life, with, as I said before, a good conscience, and with the knowledge that we have done what we could to make the enforcement equitable and just. It is because we believe that if we did not make this amendment of the law we should have to enforce that which would not be altogether just that we have introduced this Bill. What is the real question on which we are about to divide? It is this—whether we shall so amend the Land Act of 1870 as to prevent its letter being used in defeat of its spirit, and to frustrate its object. That is really the question before us. We find the tenants with an interest in their holdings acknowledged by the law. The tenants cling to their proprietary rights with tenacity. A great calamity has occurred, and by the law, as it stands, landlords might take advantage of that calamity to deprive the tenants of their rights. The great majority of the landlords would scorn to do so, but some might do so; and when the Government bring their forces to support the landlords in their just rights, they should take care that in doing so they were not enforcing the unjust claims of a few exacting landlords. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the late Attorney General for Ireland said that the safeguards in the Bill were worthless, and he named them, stating that they were merely so much set-off against the damage. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman must be aware that there can be no disturbance at all until all these conditions were fulfilled. It is not a question of set-off or diminution of compensation. It is a question whether any compensation whatever should be given. Then as to the word reasonable. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that word was used by the supporters of the anti-rent agitation; but they demand that the tenant should judge what is reasonable, while in this case it would be decided by the County Court Judge. The right hon. and learned Gentleman warned the House that the passing of the Bill would cause ruin to hundreds of landlords. I am perfectly confident, and I am fortified in that confidence by legal Gentlemen of as much knowledge, ability, experience and learning as the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, and by many Irish landlords also, that that fear is groundless. Then, again, we are told that the Bill is a mere sop. There are two ways of dealing with an agitation. You may say that the claims of agitators shall not be considered, whether they be just or not, and by so doing you may give them a power which they would not otherwise have. But is that the way in which to deal with the people of a free country having a representative Government? Is not our duty rather to find whether the agitators have any grounds for their complaints, and if they have, to remove such grounds? The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock said that he supposed the Bill had been introduced to oil the machinery of Parliament, and to remove Parliamentary obstructions; and, further, that he had for more than eight weeks been considering the question of distress in Ireland; but does the noble Lord think so badly of those who sit on this Bench as to think that in the present state of difficulty and distress in Ireland we should bring in a Bill of this kind for the mere purpose of removing or preventing obstruction? The Government has a large majority, quite apart from the assistance of the hon. Members for Cork and Mayo; but these Gentlemen who have a right to speak on behalf of the districts and the counties which they represent. It is on account, not of Parliamentary, but of administrative difficulty, that this Bill has been introduced. This Bill is, in fact, an administrative act, temporary in form, and limited in area. We know that we could carry on the government of Ireland without it; but we think it is necessary as an act of justice. A right hon. Gentleman opposite, the other night, said this Bill was the offspring of pity and fear. I do not know that pity has very much to do with it, and fear would be but a blind guide for legislation, especially for Ireland as she now is. Fear of what? Fear of hon. Gentlemen who sit on those Benches? We have no reason to fear them. But I acknowledge that the Bill is, in one sense, the offspring of fear—the fear that we, the Government of this great country, with all the force of this great country behind us, may be using that force against the miserable small cottier tenants of Ireland when, to some extent, they may have a just and true right to say that they are treated with injustice, and that is a fear which is a terror to me, and which makes me appeal to this House to take care that injustice shall not be done.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

FURNESS RAILWAY CERTIFICATE, 1880.

RESOLUTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY, in rising to move—

"That the draft certificate of the Board of Trade (laid before the House on the 25th of May last) ought not to be made,"

said, that the question had reference to the making of a railway into the town of Whitehaven, and ought not to be disposed of by a Certificate of the Board of Trade, but should be referred to a Select Committee. The Whitehaven Trustees could then be heard on the engineering features of the proposed line, to which they had objections.

Moved to resolve, That the certificate of the Board of Trade, authorising the Furness Railway Company to construct a railway in the township of Preston Quarter and parish of St.
 Bees in the county of Cumberland (a draft of which was laid before the House on the 25th of May last), ought not to be made.—(The Mar- quess of Huntly.)

LORD SUDELEY said, the Resolution moved by the noble Marquess to set aside the Certificate of the Board of Trade, after it had lain on the Table for the whole period of six weeks, was one of a most unusual character, and certainly ought not to be carried, unless there were very strong reasons indeed to justify such a course. He ventured to think that there the noble Marquess had failed to show any substantial ground, and hoped to be able to show that the Petition had been presented under a misconception of the real facts of the case. The certificate complained of was made by the Board of Trade under the Railways Construction Facilities Act, 1844, to authorize the Furness Railway Company to construct a short line of railway near Whitehaven. By that Act the draft must lie upon the Table of both Houses for six weeks before the Board of Trade could grant the Certificate. The draft was so laid on the Table on the 25th May, so that the Resolution before the House was being brought forward on the very last day, which of itself was a most unusual course. In the Petition there were three allegations—First, that the Petitioners, being proprietors of railways, the Board of Trade should have granted a Provisional Certificate instead of a Draft Certificate, the difference being that a Provisional Certificate had to be confirmed by an Act of Parliament; whereas a Draft Certificate, after being six weeks before the House, had the force of law.
 The Petitioners were, however, quite mistaken in their first allegation, as although under the Act of 1870 the Board of Trade grant a Provisional Certificate when a Railway Company oppose the scheme, in the present instance the Petitioners were not Railway Companies within the meaning of the Act; so that the Board of Trade had no option, and could not, therefore, grant a Provisional Certificate. The second allegation, that no proper investigation had been made into the merits of the scheme, seemed to be the one that the noble Marquess principally relied upon. The facts were, however, quite the reverse. Not only had Colonel Yolland, the Inspector, held a careful inquiry into the matter on the spot, but the authorities of the Board of Trade had also themselves thoroughly investigated into the merits of the case, so much so, that several alterations had been made to meet the views of the Petitioners, and the proposed railway was made to go under the road instead of over it. Then came the third allegation, which was that, the plan having been altered, the consent of the Petitioners, as landowners, ought to have been obtained. The answer to this was very simple. In the first place, the alteration had been made to meet the views of the Petitioners themselves; and, secondly, the Petitioners were not landowners within the meaning of the Act, but simply authorities having control over the road affected. These reasons seemed to him sufficient to warrant their Lordships declining to agree to the Resolution. But there was another fact which he could not help referring to—namely, that only a few hours previously a similar Motion had been made in “another place,” and had been at once withdrawn, when the true state of the case had been stated. On the very last day that the Certificate had to be on their Lordships’ Table, he thought the Resolution almost without precedent. As he knew the noble Marquess only moved the Resolution on public grounds, he hoped he had stated sufficient to induce him to withdraw his opposition.

On Question? Resolved in the Negative.

UNION ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE

(No. 104.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, the Bill was a very short one, and had encountered no opposition in its passage through the House of Commons. Its object was to enable the Local Government Board, upon application from the Guardians of what were called “single parishes,” to apply to them the provisions of the Union Assessment Committee Act (passed in 1862) in the same way as they applied it to Unions under Local Acts and to Gilbert’s Incorporations. The Act of 1862 was a great improvement upon the Parochial Assessment Act of 1836, as, instead of allowing the overseers, very often ignorant and illiterate men, to make the rates, these duties were transferred to the Guardians, who appointed a competent body, called an assessment committee, to carry out that necessary work. This change had worked well; but unfortunately single parishes, not in union, had not been able to avail themselves of its provisions, and this Bill, which was not, however, compulsory, but optional, would permit them to be brought, with the assent of the Local Government Board, under the provisions of the Act of 1862. The following was a list of parishes under separate Boards of Guardians; and he thought it would be admitted that in these cases it would be better that the assessment of property for the purposes of rates should be in the hands of an assessment committee rather than in the hands of overseers. Many of these localities were large and important places—namely, Whittlesea, Alston, East Stonehouse, Stoke Damerel, Barrow-in-Furness, Liverpool, Manchester, Toxteth Park, Great Yarmouth, Alverstoke, Stoke-upon-Trent, Brighton, Birmingham, and Saddleworth. Many of those localities had expressed themselves as favourable to the principle of this measure; and it was for that reason that, on behalf of the Local Government Board, he now moved the second reading of the Bill.

Lord Sudeley

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a.”
—(The Viscount Enfield.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

BILL.—(No. 103.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL of AIRLIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said that it affected only the people of Scotland, and its object was to extend to persons entitled to vote in counties those rights which had long been enjoyed by voters of burghs in cases where they happened to have left their houses furnished for a portion of the year. At present the occupiers of houses in counties who let their houses furnished for any portion of the year were not able to vote; and there appeared to have been great complaints upon the subject, and public attention had been aroused in consequence of the numerous disqualifications of voters that had taken place recently. It was therefore proposed that in future every man should be entitled to be registered, and to vote under the 6th section of the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, notwithstanding that during a part of the qualifying period not exceeding four months he may have let his premises as a furnished house to some other person.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Airlie.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WINMARLEIGH, in calling attention to the scheme for the future regulation of the Grammar School at Kirkham, said, that certain Petitioners who had petitioned their Lordships' House objected to the scheme on the ground that it did not observe the section applicable to such cases, and which provided that, on the framing of schemes for endowed schools, regard was to be had to the interests of all parties concerned. There were about 100 boys in the Kirkham Grammar School. The object of the founders was free education; and of those 100 boys 80 hitherto received their education under the foundation free of charge. By the new regulation a charge of not less than £4 and not more than £8 a-year would be made from last month for each boy. The change was very sudden, and it would press hardly on the poorer parents in the parish. No doubt, it would be said, the imposition of the charge was in accordance with what was being done throughout the country generally in respect of such schools; but he thought that more regard should be had to the intention of the founder than had been shown in this case. It could scarcely be said that the Charity Commissioners could not find funds for free education in the school. The foundation amounted in value to between £900 and £1,000. The salaries paid to masters were—to the head master, £250; to the second, £170; to the third, £120; and to the assistant to the head master, £120. Besides these sums, £15 a-year was paid to the French master, who had fees also. At a time when the Universities were being reformed, and efforts being made to improve the education of the country, it was very inadvisable to largely curtail the privileges offered by the free grammar schools. What the Petitioners asked for in this case had been done in the case of the Rugby Grammar School; and he hoped their representations would receive the favourable consideration of the Education Department.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that, as the scheme for the Kirkham Grammar School was drawn up when he was at the head of the Education Department, he could say that those who drew it up had endeavoured to consider the interests of all parties. As to what had been done at Rugby, he might observe that he did not think it was done under the same Endowed Schools Act as that under which the Kirkham scheme was framed. Both political Parties, when in power at the Education Department, had acted on the principle that the education in the endowed grammar schools ought not to be free. A sum of £4 a-year was only about 18*d.* a-week, for which a boy got a good commercial education. Those who could not afford to pay such a sum ought not to go to a grammar school, but to a primary school. At Kirkham School £260 a-year was to be given for out scholarships, and two sums of £100 each for scholarships in the school itself. What his noble Friend wanted to have done would not be effected in the way he seemed to think. The scheme, or any paragraph in it, might be rejected; but that would not give free education, and words could not be added to the scheme.

EARL SPENCER concurred in what had been stated by his noble Friend the late Lord President of the Council. He might add that children who had been for three years in a primary school at Kirkham might obtain one of the scholarships at the grammar school, and in that way obtain a free education. He could not hold out any hope that the scheme would be changed; it would be impossible to amend the scheme without wholly altering its character. He saw no objection, however, to let the matter go before the Charity Commissioners; and, if they thought fit, they might alter the scheme as they had power to do. He had not been able to hold any communication with the Commissioners upon the subject; but if his noble Friend would do so, he might possibly be able to obtain an extension of the time in regard to the commencement of the scheme.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION—THE NEW CODE, 1880—THE FOURTH SCHEDULE.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD NORTON, on rising to ask the Lord President of the Council, Whether almost all of the Inspectors of the Education Department had not in their last Reports deprecated the grants to Elementary Schools for results in examination on specific subjects in the Fourth Schedule, as leading to bad secondary instruction and to the neglect of the primary, and as checking a better provision of secondary education to which scholarships might be given to clever children of the working classes; and whether the Reports of the present year, not yet published, did not express the same view even more strongly; and whether he will lay on the Table an extract from each Inspector's Report of any remarks on the specific subjects? said, he only wished to add that he thought it should be made public that the Inspectors of the Education Department took the view which their Lordships by a large majority took about a week ago, when he moved an Address upon the subject. He submitted that the opinion of the Inspectors was of much greater weight than that of the school boards upon this subject, who were notoriously wishing to keep children at their schools to the age of 18—that was, to have the secondary education of the country, however taught, in their hands, even though such teaching might stand in the way of better education, both primary and secondary. The opinion of the Inspectors was also of more importance than that of school managers, who were afraid to lose the 4s. grants attached to examinations in the Fourth Schedule; though he would make up that loss by another grant, beyond that for reading, for understanding what was read. The Address for excluding attempts at studying sciences and foreign languages from elementary instruction was taken by some for a retrograde step in education, instead of what it really was, an emancipation from mischievous confusion of education. The distinction of secondary and special from primary and general education was recognized everywhere but in our Code. In Scotland both were carried on in the same school—but kept distinct as to age, subject, and rate of payment—not interfering the one with the other. The distinction was recognized in the schools of all European countries; and, though Mr. Mundella had stated in the other House that elementary education was carried higher in other countries than in this, he could refer to the evidence given before the Endowed Schools Commissioners in 1868 to prove the reverse of that statement. The elementary course did not in any country include as much as our class subjects, nor have anything like our Fourth Schedule of scientific study in it. In the extracts from Inspectors' Reports, which he had circulated, the Fourth Schedule was shown to be not only mischievously in the way of primary education, but worthless as secondary. Such instruction was described as dry and technical, and such as might be expected from teachers who had got it up from meagre text-books. He had just seen the Report of a London Board School, Bermondsey, in which it was said that far too much was sacrificed to these specific subjects, which showed only a moderate result. The National Society and the School Managers' Association had petitioned that day, strongly taking the view of the late Address; and he had no doubt that more and more such Petitions would come in as the point became understood. As he understood the Lord President to say that though he would not promise to expunge this Fourth Schedule and make way for better secondary education, which would then be abundantly opened to all classes, this year, yet he left himself free to deal with the entire Code next year, he was content to wait till the strong opinions of his Inspectors, and the support which would come from all sides throughout the country, should confirm him in the conclusion at which he could not but think he had already arrived. The noble Lord concluded by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

EARL SPENCER said, he had undertaken to inquire into the whole of this subject before the next Session of Parliament; and while he did not deprecate any expression of opinion on it that evening, he was exceedingly glad to hear the noble Lord state that it was not his intention to again bring it forward this Session. While wishing to guard himself against being led into a debate on the present occasion, he wished, in consequence of something said by the noble Lord, to say that he had the highest respect for the views of the experienced and distinguished gentlemen who acted as Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools. He thought their opinions on this subject were of great weight; but he still maintained that the opinions of the school boards on it were also entitled to high consideration. He was glad to see that the noble Lord had revised his Question by inserting before "all of the Inspectors" the important word "almost." There were some 126 Inspectors; but only about 27 of them reported each year. It was quite true that many of the Inspectors complained of the manner in which children answered questions on primary education; but that was a very different thing from recommending that the Fourth Schedule be expunged. Some Inspectors advocated certain special subjects, others advocated others; it was, therefore, unfair to say that, as a body, they wished to have special subjects wholly done away with. The synopsis of the opinions of School Inspectors, which the noble Lord opposite had referred to, was so inaccurate that he could not refrain from correcting it in one or two particulars. Inspector Arnold was represented as desiring the exclusion from Schedule IV. of, among other subjects, Latin and French. Now, as to these, what did Mr. Arnold say?—

"Everyone is agreed as to the exceptional position of Latin among the languages for our study. Our schoolboy of 13 will do little with his rudiments of Latin unless he carries on his education beyond the scope of our elementary schools and their programmes. But if he does carry it beyond that scope, Latin is almost a necessity for him. By allowing Latin as a special subject for a certain number of scholars in our elementary schools we are but recognizing that necessity."

Mr. Arnold continued:—

"French, too, has a special claim. To know the rudiments of French has a commercial value. . . . Here is a reason for admitting French to our list of extra subjects."

Mr. Fitch's views, again, were not accurately represented, owing to the omission of a qualifying passage. Mr. Fitch said:—

"The claims of science, English literature, physical geography, domestic economy, and the other specific subjects, appear to me to be much higher than Latin, French, or German. For every one of these can be carried to a point, even before the age of 13, far enough to possess real value, and what is still more important, every one of them is so connected with the rest of the course that it can be begun and taught in a rudimentary way even in the lowest classes."

He was sorry to detain their Lordships; but he felt bound to point out the inaccuracies which he had mentioned, and which did not stand alone. It seemed to him that to quote isolated passages from Reports without the qualification of the context was scarcely fair. As to the Fourth Schedule, no doubt a considerable difference of opinion existed. In reference to the last part of the Question, the Reports this year certainly continued to be more unfavourable to these subjects; but they all pointed to one thing—that children should be placed in a higher standard before they were allowed to take these special subjects. This was a matter which he had said before he would take into account and consider, and he would most carefully go into the subject during the Recess; and it would be a matter of great gratification to him if he could arrive at a solution of the difficulty which would meet with the general concurrence of their Lordships.

EARL NELSON wished to take that opportunity of correcting an erroneous impression which appeared to exist out-of-doors, that those noble Lords who voted in favour of the Address to the Crown, the other night, were desirous of stopping the education of the children of the people. He, for one, had always been most anxious that the scholars of elementary schools should have an opportunity of rising to secondary education, and that view was not inconsistent with disapproval of the Fourth Schedule. A few days ago he had the honour to preside at a meeting of the Council of the General Association of Church School Managers and Teachers; and while the meeting was desirous of promoting the education of the children of the elementary schools, it was unanimously of opinion, and had drawn up a Petition to that effect, that at present the interests of those children were really injured by the Fourth Schedule. What they desired to see was facilities afforded to the children of elementary schools for continuing their education in secondary schools.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I am glad the noble Earl opposite (Earl Nelson) has made the explanation he has now given, because it is undoubtedly true that a general impression prevails out-of-doors that the vote of this House the other night was a "re-actionary" vote—a vote in contradistinction to and calculated to arrest the progress of education. I am convinced that the majority of those Peers who voted on that occasion have no wish to lower the standard of education. The fault was their own, both from their speeches and their votes; and I am, I confess, very much puzzled to understand how the noble Duke could have concurred in a vote, not for the Amendment of the Fourth Schedule, not for the preservation of those modifications of it which he himself initiated, and for which there is much to be said—I am puzzled to make out how he could have voted in favour of striking out the whole of the Fourth Schedule altogether. The allusion of the noble Earl (Earl Nelson) has also convinced me that the views I hold on the subject have been misunderstood, and I am confirmed in that by the fact that the noble Earl on the Bench below me (Earl Fortescue), who voted on that side the other night, has sent me a pamphlet on the subject, with almost every word of which I find I concur. There were two distinct propositions in that pamphlet, and one is that the middle-class and secondary education shall not be paid for out of the rates. In that opinion I entirely concur. I hold it as strongly as any noble Lord on the other side of the House that we should, as far as possible, not provide for secondary or what is called middle-class education out of the rates, which are intended for primary education; but then, my Lords, there was a second proposition which was entirely distinct, and that was that in primary schools you should not teach any elements except the elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic, a wholly separate proposition, and from that I wholly dissent. I hold that there are many subjects of which you can teach the elements in primary schools. That is a totally different proposition from the others to which I have referred. Perhaps the noble Lord opposite will say, how do you distinguish between secondary or middle-class education and primary education? There are but two ways of distinguishing between these two subjects, and they are by definition as to age, and also by limitation of expense. The attempt to separate the two kinds of education by exclusion of particular subjects is to my mind wholly futile and erroneous, because there is no subject of which you cannot reach the elements, and any distinction breaks down entirely if you follow the principle laid down by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), because I believe he is the author of the paragraph in the Education Code which introduces class subjects. The definition of class subjects is this—subjects that can be taught by means of reading lessons. Now, what can be taught by means of reading lessons, or what is there that cannot be taught by means of reading? Hardly any. To refer to what I have already said on the subject of education in Scotland—and I can say this, that in the course of reading lessons given in that country all sorts of subjects are taught to the children with great success—I shall never forget, about 20 years ago, going into a little school in one of the Western Highlands of Scotland. It was a school which externally would have raised the horror of the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council. It would not have suited any of the rules laid down by him. It was what was called a dry stone building, with a thatched roof and a mud floor. On going into the school I found in it a number of children, extremely poor, reading a lesson with extraordinary intelligence of expression. One of the first subjects given to the children to read me was a description of how metallic ores were treated before the smelt-

ing process. The noble Lord opposite will say, "How extremely absurd to teach metallurgy to poor children in a small school of that kind." Well, my Lords, there was a little boy not more than 10 years old who read an extract describing how lead ore was treated. The description said that it was pounded and subjected to a current of running water in order to free it from extraneous matters. My Lords, I thought it was impossible that a poor child who was hardly clothed could have understood the meaning of such a word as "extraneous." I thought it was a mere "cram," and that he would be unable to answer any other question about this elaborate metallurgical process; and, wishing to test him, I asked him—"Now my boy, what is the meaning of 'extraneous?'" He looked at me in the greatest surprise and astonished that I did not know, and at once answered the question by saying—"Not belonging to it." Now, my Lords, I will put that question—"What is the meaning of the word 'extraneous?'" to many highly cultivated persons, and nine out of 10, however highly cultivated they may be, will fail to give me as clear and complete an answer as that little child. It shows what can be elicited from children when extracts from various subjects, however scientific, are intelligently taught; and I came to the conclusion, looking at the intelligence manifested by the children in their reading lessons, that a great deal of the intelligence was derived from the fact that they are bi-lingual, the language used at the schools being English, and that used at their homes being Gaelic, and that the attempt to translate their ideas from one to the other was in itself a process which brought out the highest intellectual powers. My Lords, I cannot help thinking that it is a great advantage to teach in primary schools the elements of French and Latin. In Scotland they teach all the children the elements of Latin and of French on payment of a small fee; and if it were possible to teach the children in the primary schools in this country the elements of French and Latin, and so compel them to translate their ideas from one language to another, I am convinced that you will introduce into the schools a most powerful element for bringing out the intelligence of the children. I am confirmed in this view by some observations of the Welsh Inspectors; and I may say here at once, on seeing the Notice of the noble Lord opposite, I referred to the Reports in your Lordships' Library, and on going through them I at once ascertained the extreme inaccuracy of the extracts quoted by the noble Lord (Lord Norton). I do not doubt but that he was perfectly honest in his intention; but he read these Reports with one idea in his mind, and, like every other man who reads through long documents with a fixed intention, he saw nothing but that which supported his own view. In his remarks he has quoted a passage from Mr. Arnold's Report; but Mr. Arnold distinctly says that he is in favour of introducing the elements both of Latin and French into elementary schools. Now, my Lords, going to another part of the country, where the children are also bi-lingual, I find there is great inducement offered in the new Code for the efficient teaching of extra subjects, thus giving great impetus to the work of education now attempted in all the schools of Wales, and which have been productive of the greatest improvement and in increasing the intelligence of the children in ordinary subjects. I have mentioned to your Lordships a case of the intelligence of children in Scotland, who by reading most of them could understand the science of metallurgy; but I venture to say you might have got extracts from a great many scientific writers of former times which would be equally intelligible to the ordinary children in the schools of the country. I was only reading the other day a subject which I certainly thought it would be impossible for children to understand in the elementary schools. I refer to the "Optics" of Sir Isaac Newton, and I found there a passage explaining the cause of the decay of human sight, and why it was that spectacles were useful to aged persons, described, as your Lordships can imagine, in magnificent English, and after reading it, I was perfectly convinced that you might even, by judicious extracts from the writings of our great writers, teach in our elementary schools the elements of most of the sciences. If the noble Earl can explain away the impression produced out-of-doors by the recent vote of the House, I think it will be a great advantage. The Lord President of the Council has promised that he will consider the subject in the Recess, and, no doubt, he will do so in the sincere desire to meet the views of the great majority of the House; but your Lordships must feel it is impossible for Her Majesty's Government, in consequence of a vote of either House of Parliament, to expunge from the Code a great variety of the teaching which for nine or ten years has been enjoyed by the working classes of the country. I do not think that the demands made by the working classes will be met by a few exhibitions being established here and there. I am convinced that your Lordships do not wish to lower the standard of education, but will be willing to leave with elementary teaching a great variety of subjects, in order that the parents of the scholars may select for themselves what subjects they would like their children to be examined upon.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he should not have taken part in the discussion but for the remarks which had been made by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll). The Lord President of the Council had promised that he would, during the Recess, take the subject into his consideration, with a view of meeting the views of the great majority of their Lordships. He sincerely hoped, however, that in doing so he would not call into his council the advice of the noble Duke.

EARL SPENCER, interposing, said, he could not promise to carry out the views of the majority of the House; but simply that he would take care that the views of their Lordships were not left out of account.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, anyhow he hoped the advice of the noble Duke would not be called in, inasmuch as the noble Duke entirely differed from the views which a few nights before found favour with the great majority of the House. In the Act of 1872 a line was drawn which was omitted from the Act of 1870, and which rendered necessary the limitations of the Fourth Schedule which Her Majesty's present Advisers proposed should be struck out. He (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had been charged with wishing to expunge the Fourth Schedule from the Code. Why did he wish to do so? Because the Government had struck out the safeguard, without which the provisions could not be properly worked. The limitation of age was, for instance, struck out. That, he thought, ought not to have been done. The noble Duke some years ago was in favour of limits—

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: So I am now.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: But those limitations which were in the Code had been struck out by the Government. These were the reasons which induced him to vote as he did the other night; and if the matter were brought forward again he should give a similar vote, as he had not been convinced that he was wrong in the course which he took on that occasion. He would like to know from the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), who was in some part responsible for the Education Act, whether it was right to extend this education all over the country without those safeguards which he (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) so much wished to obtain, because some years ago the noble Earl supported the revised Code, which only allowed the "three R's" to be taught.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET expressed approval of the speech of the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council, and said that he should be quite satisfied if village boys could be taught to read and to understand what they read.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he wished to clear himself of the charge of inconsistency which had been levelled against him. He had been asked whether he was not partly responsible for the revised Code of the "three R's." Well, it should be remembered that it was provided in connection with that Code that there should be a reduction in the grants to a school if the general teaching of the school was not of an intelligent character. Since the time when this provision was made a larger number of subjects had certainly been introduced into elementary schools, for which state of things no one was more responsible than the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon); and when the noble Duke talked of want of consistency he could say that he (Earl Granville) had been more consistent than he had himself, because, when the subject was first introduced by the noble Lord (Lord Norton), he had treated the arguments of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) in the most contemptuous manner, and then, on the last occasion, suddenly turned round, and instead of proposing to amend the Schedule by the introduction of safeguards, voted en bloc against it.

VISCOUNT SHERBROOKE pointed out that it was one thing not to interfere with the subjects taught in a school, but another to give payment for those subjects. Some subjects which were read about in schools formed an excellent adjunct to a child's education; but when they were paid for the teachers were really being bribed to neglect their primary duty—namely, that of teaching the children intrusted to their care how to read. Whatever inducements might be offered by the State in its desire to extend the advantages of education, care should be taken not to encourage the teacher to avoid the dull and tedious, but most important, task of teaching his scholars to read well. Besides, the moment they directed the attention of teachers to these special subjects by making grants towards them they would find that the bright children would be pushed to pass the examinations to the disadvantage of the general education of the school. They would give a smattering of the higher subjects that would tend to raise the children in their own conceit, but would leave them absolutely without a knowledge of the rudiments of education. He repeated what he said the other evening, that it was impossible to find children in our elementary schools who could read well. It was of infinitely more importance that a boy should read well than he should be able to show off the little he had learnt in one of these subjects.

LORD WINMARLEIGH considered that it was injurious to introduce special subjects into elementary schools, because it induced the teachers to neglect some pupils in order to advance others who showed more aptitude and intelligence in special subjects. While that was the case there ought to be some check that could be brought to bear upon them.

EARL FORTESCUE protested, on his own behalf and on that of his right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Exeter), against the allegation that they were re-actionary in this matter, or opposed to a further diffusion of education among the wage-earning class. He (Earl Fortescue) had again and again in his time dwelt upon the injustice done in not extending more widely exhibitions and scholarships in the endowed schools for their benefit. What they contended against was giving second-grade education in elementary schools. He felt, however, satisfied with the assurance given by his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he had some personal knowledge of young men educated in some of their National Schools; and his experience differed greatly from that of his noble Friend (Viscount Sherbrooke). He ventured to say there were some who read and spelt as well as, and even better than, a large proportion of the sons of gentlemen of the same age, and who certainly spelt better than some sons of gentlemen with whom he had occasionally come in contact. He believed that the education given by the National Schools in reading, writing, and arithmetic, was at least as good as that received, in the same elementary subjects, by the higher classes. He entirely concurred in the principle enunciated by the noble Duke below the Gangway (the Duke of Somerset), who said that in this matter they ought to consider not only the children in the towns, but those in the rural districts also; only he would add the converse proposition, that they should consider not agricultural children only, but also those in the large manufacturing and other towns. They should consider not only one class, but children of all classes. If they did not bridge over the transition from primary to elementary education by giving such facilities as they could for learning something more, consistently with the main objects of the elementary system of education, they would, in his opinion, make a great mistake. It came to the knowledge of the Oxford University Commission, of which he (the Lord Chancellor) was a Member, through an influentially signed Petition from Manchester, that in cities and towns where the population was large, many of the poorest boys in the elementary schools were discovered to have quite sufficient ability to learn not only the elementary subjects, but to pass through the elementary schools into higher schools, and so to the Universities. Those boys could not have been sent, in the first instance, to a second-grade school; they could not pass to such a school without some help; and, if a hard and fast line were drawn between the teaching in the elementary school and that in the school above it, they would never have been qualified to go forward. That was a state of things of which he thought it would be a very great error indeed on the part of those who presided over the Educational Department not to take notice. He was perfectly convinced that if Inspectors did their duty there would be no difficulty whatever in reconciling such facilities as the Fourth Schedule gave for learning something more, with the highest efficiency in the teaching of reading, writing, and arithmetic; and, where the subjects in the Fourth Schedule were taught, with good results, he could see no reason for discouraging, or not encouraging them.

LORD NORTON asked the noble Earl (Earl Spencer) if he would give the House extracts from the Inspectors' Reports both of last year and the present giving their opinion on the Fourth Schedule? The extracts which he had circulated were such as related to this subject as referred to in the margins, and were ipsissima verba from the Reports themselves, and he maintained that they were not qualified in substance by the contexts.

EARL SPENCER said, he must object to give extracts. The Reports would shortly be laid on the Table in the usual manner, and he hoped that they would be sufficient for the noble Lord.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)— EJECTMENTS.

EARL SPENCER wished to explain, in reference to the Motion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Annesley) last evening for Returns as to Civil Bill Ejectments, that he now proposed to make the Returns in two parts. The first would be the Return moved for by Mr. J. Lowther in the House of Commons in the last Parliament, and which would be laid on their Lordships' Table in a few days; and the second would be the additional Returns down to the 30th of June last. He hoped that this would be satisfactory to the noble Earl, who he was sorry to see was not then present.

The Lord Chancellor

Return, in tabular form, of the number of civil bill ejectments in each county, distinguishing ejectments on the title from those for non-payment of rent, tried and determined in each county in Ireland for each of the three years ending the 31st day of December 1879, exclusive of ejectments for premises situate in counties of cities, boroughs, and towns, under the Act 9th Geo. IV. chap. 82., or the Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854, or any local Act:—Ejectments entered: On Title; Non-payment of Rent: Decrees granted: Decrees executed: Dismisses: Cases otherwise disposed of.

Ordered to be laid before the House.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Lush and Mr. Justice Manisty, two of the Judges selected, in pursuance of The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the Town of Lichfield.

And the same were read, as followeth:—

LICHFIELD ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

The Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices Act, 1879.

To the Right Honourable

The Speaker of the House of Commons.

We, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Lush, knight, and the Honourable Sir Henry Manisty, knight, Judges of the High Court of Justice, and two of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Acts, certify that upon the 28th, 29th, and 30th days of June, and the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 5th days of July 1880, We duly held a Court at the Guildhall, in the Borough of Lichfield, in the County of Stafford, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said Borough between Sir John Swinburne, baronet, Petitioner; and Richard Dyott, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Acts, We certify and report that at the conclusion of the said trial we determined that the said Richard Dyott, being the Member whose Election and Return were complained of in the said Petition was not duly elected and returned, and that his Election and Return were and are wholly null and void on the ground of abduction by the Respondent's agents of voters, whereby they were prevented from voting at such Election, and we do hereby certify in writing such our determination to you.

And whereas charges were made of corrupt practices having been committed at the said Election, we, in further pursuance of the said Acts, report as follows:—

(a.) That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any Candidate at such Election;

(b.) We further report that the following persons have been proved at the trial to have been guilty of the corrupt practice of abduction of voters, whereby they were prevented from voting:—

Frederick Symonds, a Justice of the Peace for the Borough of Lichfield; James Spooner, Market Gardener, Lichfield;

(c.) We further report that there is no reason to believe corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the Election for the Borough of Lichfield to which the said Petition relates.

Dated this 5th day of July 1880.

ROBT. LUSH.
H. MANISTY.

And the said Certificate and Report were ordered to be entered in the Journals of this House.

FURNESS RAILWAY CERTIFICATE, 1880. RESOLUTION.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the draft Certificate of the Board of Trade now lying upon the Table, entitled ‘The Furness Railway Certificate, 1880,’ ought not to be made.”—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck)

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, the Certificate was passed by the Board of Trade under the Railway Facilities Acts, and the opponents received a full hearing. Their objections were fully inquired into, Colonel Yolland, one of the most able and experienced of the Board's Inspectors, having been sent down to visit Whitehaven and make a local inquiry. Colonel Yolland's views were embodied in the Report which the Board of Trade had laid upon the Table of the House. The Trustees of Whitehaven Harbour had no locus standi as competing railway proprietors, because their railway only ran round the harbour, and could not in any way be of service in bringing the coal from the Croft Pit to the Furness Railway, that being the object of the promoters of the line for which a Certificate had been given. That was also the answer to the objection which the Harbour Trustees urged against the Board of Trade for not having given a Provisional Order instead of a Certificate. They had no power under the Act to make a Provisional Order unless the opposition came from a competent Railway or Canal Company. It was further urged that the modification in the scheme which Colonel Yolland recommended and the Board of Trade carried out to meet the representations of the Harbour Trustees as to the interference with their road were ultra vires. While he (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) denied this, he, at the same time, pointed out that this objection came with very bad grace from the Harbour Trustees, as it was at their instance, and for their benefit, that the alterations were made. The Board of Trade submitted that, having made a full inquiry, and heard all the parties concerned, and then made a Certificate in accordance with the provisions of the Act of Parliament, they might fairly ask the House not to annul their act without inquiry.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he was greatly obliged to his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade for the explanation he had been good enough to give. He had been intrusted with a Petition from the municipal authorities of Whitehaven, who were also the urban sanitary authority, in which a complaint was made of the Order of the Board of Trade, which had been placed upon the Table, under the Railway Construction Act. He had, therefore, considered it his duty to bring the matter under the attention of the Board of Trade, in order to see that no irregularity was committed, and no absolute injustice done. Having heard the explanation of his hon. Friend, he was bound to say that it did seem to him satisfactory as regarded the nature of the inquiry held. It also clearly showed that the technical grounds advanced by the Petitioners for objecting to the Order would fail before any Committee of the House, and that it would be held by the highest authorities that they had no locus standi in the matter. Under these circumstances, and feeling that the matter had been fully brought under the notice of the House, and in a mode that was satisfactory to the Petitioners, who, he hoped, would see that nothing had been left undone to establish their rights, if they had any, he had much pleasure in complying with the request of his hon. Friend, and he would not persevere with the Resolution he had moved.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PRISONS ACT, 1865—THE PLANK BED.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will state under what circumstances the plank bed was introduced into prisons; whether this form of discipline was found to answer any good purpose; and, if he will lay upon the Table the present instructions in regard to its use?

MR. ARTHUR PEEL, in reply, said, that the history of the use of the plank bed in prisons was shortly this. A Select Committee of the Lords reported in 1863 that the use of plank beds, similar to the guards' bed in military prisons, should be resorted to during short sentences and the earlier stages of long confinements. In the Prison Act of 1865 there was an enactment to the effect that a convicted criminal prisoner might be required to sleep on a plank bed without mattress during such time as might be determined by the Rules of the prison. The fact of this plank bed having been almost universally used since 1865 might be taken to indicate that it had been found to answer its purpose. The Secretary of State gave orders in 1878 that women, men over 60, and children under 13, should have a pillow and a mattress of some other material used. The hon. Member had asked if he would lay on the Table a copy of the instructions with regard to the use of the bed. The rule as to the practice was to be found in the Report of the Prison Commissioners, which was laid on the Table on the 19th February, 1878. Of these Rules, Rule 16 ran thus—

“A convicted criminal prisoner shall during the whole of his sentence, when it does not exceed one month, and during one month of his sentence when it exceeds that period, be required to sleep on a plank bed; but that a prisoner shall be allowed the opportunity of earning by industry the gradual remission of this requirement, which, however, he shall be liable again to forfeit by idleness, inattention to instruction, or misconduct.”

EDUCATION (IRELAND)—REMISSION OF RESULT FEES.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If, considering the inability this year of the parents of children attending national schools in the districts in Ireland to contribute as in better years the proportion of school fees required in order to entitle the teachers to results fees, and the consequent total loss of such reward to the teacher, though otherwise fully earned by him, the Education Board will take into consideration the advisability of some temporary modification of the rules, so as to remedy for the current year such loss?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, this matter has had the attention of the Irish Government, and in consequence of their representations the Treasury have decided for the year ending the 31st of March, 1881, results fees shall be paid in schools in scheduled Unions to the extent of half of the full amount, irrespective of the local contributions.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Brassey.)

COMMITTEE. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

Question [2nd July], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on the Employers' Liability (re-committed) Bill):—

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no measure dealing with the Employers' Liabilities for Injuries sustained by their Servants can be accepted as a satisfactory solution of the question which admits, as a ground of defence in any action or proceeding brought for the recovery of damages or for compensation in respect to bodily injury or loss of life, that the person by whose negligence the injury or loss of life is alleged to have been occasioned was employed in a common employment with the person killed or injured,"—(Mr. Macdonald,)

Debate resumed.

MR. WARTON said, he must insist on the necessity of referring the Bill to a Select Committee. The subject required a great deal of careful consideration, owing to the various conflicting interests both of masters and men engaged in different trades and pursuits which had rules and customs peculiar to themselves. It would be impossible to lay down rules applicable to all these multifarious trades and pursuits. The House had not the requisite knowledge to do so, and the task could only be successfully undertaken by a Committee upstairs. Was it reasonable that one man should be liable for the negligence of another? He denied that it was either morally just or legally right. No doubt, on both sides of the House there was the deepest sympathy for the working men. Both sides wished to do what was right and just with regard to the working men; but what was the proposition of the Government? It only extended to some particular cases, and those were very few compared with those described as accidents; and he asked the attention of the Attorney General as to whether he had not known a long trial lasting some days, the question being to determine whether the event was the result of accident or of negligence? In his opinion, the Bill was not so logical as that of the hon. Member's (Mr. Macdonald's), because that hon. Member's Bill applied to all cases of negligence; whereas the Government confined it to cases of negligence on the part of those placed in a position of superintendence. He thought the best course was to provide compensation by way of insurance. In that case, no trial need take place, and the injured workmen would be compensated on the right and proper scale. For 40 years the law had been as it was now, and during that period employers and employed had entered into contracts under it. It would not be said that the workmen could not contract with their employers, and for this reason—that they were members of great Trades Unions, which were strong enough to dictate the rate of wages that should be paid. Employers of labour, he had heard on good authority, were disposed to be very generous, and to be ready for insurance purposes to put down sovereign for sovereign with their workmen. Was it not worth while, then, to inquire whether a system of insurance which would work satisfactorily to all parties could not be devised? It was a question which could well be considered fully and calmly by practical men in a Select Committee. The case of railway servants stood on a different footing, and he regretted that it had been used at the late elections as a lever for the intimidation of candidates. He opposed the Bill in its present form; and in reference to railway servants he thought their case ought not to be included in a general measure. The wages of miners and other persons engaged in dangerous employments were equal to the pay of a captain in the Army, and were something more than the emoluments of a curate in the Church. He, consequently, did not think they should claim to supplement those high wages by compensation in case of injury. He considered they should not pass hastily a Bill which would only lead to litigation; and he asked the House to take into consideration his counter scheme, which would do justice to all.

MR. MACDONALD asked leave to withdraw the Resolution which stood in his name with reference to common employment.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN rose to a point of Order. This was the second occasion on which the hon. Member for Stafford had risen to withdraw his Resolution, and it was desirable to hear from the Speaker whether this was in Order or not. He should like to know from the Government whether they were in favour of the Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not speaking to a question of Order. On Friday last the hon. Member for Stafford applied to withdraw his Amendment, and I put the usual Question, "That the Amendment be, by leave, withdrawn." Leave was not given, and now the hon. Member renews his application.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, he only wished to know exactly the position in which the House stood. The Resolution of the hon. Member for Stafford stated that—

"No measure dealing with the Employers' Liabilities for Injuries sustained by their Servants can be accepted as a satisfactory solution of the question which admits, as a ground of defence in any action or proceeding brought for the recovery of damages or for compensation in respect to bodily injury or loss of life, that the person by whose negligence the injury or loss of life is alleged to have been occasioned was employed in a common employment with the person killed or injured;"

and before he was permitted to withdraw it the House ought to be informed as to what was the attitude of the Government in the matter. Were they in favour of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Stafford or not? If they were in favour of it, there was all the more reason for sending the Bill to a Select Committee. If they were not, then, he asked, what bargain had been come to between Her Majesty's Government and the hon. Member for Stafford which induced him to withdraw that which he considered a cardinal proposition. Until a satisfactory explanation had been given on that point both by the Government and the hon. Member for Stafford, he should certainly oppose the withdrawal of the Resolution.

MR. HINDE PALMER thought the motive of the hon. Member for Stafford in seeking to withdraw his Resolution, as well as the attitude of the Government in regard to it, was sufficiently clear from what had preceded. In submitting the Resolution the hon. Member for Stafford distinctly intimated that he did not wish to retard the progress of the Bill; and the Government had stated, over and over again, that they distinctly repudiated the hon. Member's proposition.

MR. STAVELEY HILL hoped that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stafford would be allowed to be withdrawn. It was intended there should have been a decision as to whether the question should or should not go to a Select Committee; but the Government had met them in a fair way, and it would, therefore, be far better to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN said, that, with a strong desire to save the time of the House, he would not insist upon a division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. KNOWLES moved that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, with the view of afterwards instructing them to consider—

"Whether efficient provision cannot be made for all persons injured during their employment, and for the widows and orphans of those killed by accident, by an insurance fund contributed by masters and workmen, and whether the same would not be more beneficial to the workman than the right of action proposed to be given by the Bill."

The hon. Member said, that, having listened with great attention to the debate as far as it had gone, he had come to the conclusion that the Bill was so surrounded by difficulties that it could not be satisfactorily dealt with in a Committee of the Whole House. To confirm the principle of the Bill as at present drawn would only be to give rise to further agitation, which would be kept up until the liability of employers would be made to extend to the humblest among the employés entitled to give orders in manufacturing or mining operations. As to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Stafford, no doubt it had been withdrawn simply because pressure had been put upon him by the Government. [MR. MACDONALD: No.] If the Government passed the Bill before the House, they would affirm the principle of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Stafford. In moving his Resolution the hon. Member referred to two or three cases, which he seemed to presume supported his views with regard to common employment. In the case of an engineman and a collier, or a miner, he said that there was no common employment between the two. In his (Mr. Knowles') opinion, there was a common employment between an engineman and a miner. He meant by an engineman not an engine driver, but the person who attends to the engine by which the miner was let down to his work in the mine, by which his produce was brought to the surface, and by which he was himself brought back to the surface when his day's work was done. If there was no common employment between these two he did not know what constituted common employment. It was said that the proposed alteration of the law would only assimilate the law of this country to that of France, of Germany, of Belgium, and of other countries; but it seemed to be forgotten that the conditions of the labour market in the different countries differed most materially. In Belgium, for instance, women and children were employed in work connected with mining operations without any restrictions whatever; the working classes were paid at the rate of about two-thirds of the amount received in this country, and their hours of labour were about a third longer in duration. [Mr. MACDONALD dissented.] The expression of the hon. Member showed that differences of opinion existed; and, therefore, there was the greater importance for instituting such an inquiry as could take place before a Select Committee, which would have the full facts before it. It was further worthy of remark that in the countries to which reference had been made in support of the present proposal the relations of labour to the State were very different from those existing in this country. There the State owned the mines and the railways, and if colliery proprietors made no profit they had to pay no royalties—the Government taking the precaution to employ the best means of providing that profit should be made by appointing Inspectors to see that the operations were conducted on the best principles; but whether there was profit or not made upon English mines, those working the mines had to pay both royalty and rent, and there were instances in this country where rents and royalty to the extent of £15,000 and £20,000 a-year were paid, and no profits were made at all. There were many other differences between the conditions of labour in Continental countries and our own, which made an assimilation of the law as difficult as it would be unjust. In those countries to which he had referred there was a very arbitrary mode of settling disputes. If a strike occurred, before very long the military were called out. The proposals in the present Bill were calculated to destroy the freedom of contract, and he did not think that the House would be willing to go back to the practices which had obtained in the days of feudalism. He did not think that the hon. Member for Stafford would like to return to the days of serfdom and slavery which existed when the present law was passed, and there were only masters and men; but if they were to do away with freedom of contract they were going back to the old days of serfdom. He contended that up to the present employers of labour had done their duty to their employés. He did not like the existing law, for it was admittedly unjust; many celebrated lawyers and Judges had said so. Upon it, however, bad as it was, their institutions were built, and if it was altered the foundations of their great commercial undertakings would be rendered very unsafe. He could see nothing that was fair in the Bill. Nothing in the Bill indicated that it had proceeded from people of experience, and he could only come to the conclusion that it had originated with a class whose object it was to harass the employers of the country, and to set masters and men at loggerheads with one another—a class, in fact, whose very existence depended upon the keeping of masters and men at variance, whereas the success of trade rested in a great measure upon both classes working in harmony. The hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had said that he could not see how compulsory insurance could be practical. He (Mr. Knowles) was confident that a practical method could be devised by a Select Committee which would satisfy everybody, and be an enormous boon to workpeople injured in their employment. It had been stated that this matter of insurance had been brought forward in consequence of this Bill. Well, he might point out that in a pamphlet written by Mr. Campbell, a gentleman of very considerable importance upon the subject, he stated that he had always known of such a provision as insurance for meeting accidents in dangerous employments before and since 1862, and he (Mr. Knowles) had since known the institution to gradually grow all his life. At all the collieries with which he had ever been connected arrangements were made to meet the consequences of accidents; but they were not of a permanent character. Since 1862 societies for the permanent relief of injured colliers had been growing, and they had done a great deal of good. If this Bill was passed the master would not be responsible for more than 5 per cent of the accidents, and what was to be done with the other 95? His object in sending the subject before a Select Committee was that the whole 100 should be provided for. That morning he had received a letter on the present Bill from a legal gentleman, in which he said that his sympathies were all with the Liberal Government; but he regretted that they had taken up such an arbitrary, slovenly, and ill-considered piece of amateur legislation as the Bill of Mr. Brassey, and he also regretted that the Attorney General had stated that the question of insurance had now only come to the front; whereas two witnesses gave evidence with regard to it to the Select Committee that had sat upon the subject. The necessity for an investigation was shown by the fact that the Government appeared not to know that for many years compulsory insurance had been in operation in Germany, and had worked well. The Select Committee appointed by the late Government did not understand the question. The Government did not realize the importance of it. The Committee did not give prominence to this feature in their Report; and they, consequently, did not know that compulsory insurance in Germany had worked well. Now, these were the opinions of a legal gentleman who had considered the question well. As to the Bill now before the House, it should be remembered that it went much beyond the lines of their Report. The Committee reported that no extension of the law was desirable. He (Mr. Knowles) would enter his feeble protest against the alterations being proposed in the present law. The Bill he regarded as both undesirable and unnecessary, and it was anything but a compensation Bill. It was a litigation Bill, for all the compensation would be swallowed up in litigation. In the conversations that he had had with employers on this subject during the last two or three years, not one of them expressed themselves as desirous of shirking any fair and just responsibility. He trusted that the Government would not ignore the deputation which waited upon the Premier a week or two ago. It consisted of gentlemen who represented capital to the amount of between £1,200,000,000 and £1,800,000,000. They had considered this question over and over again for the last three years, and they had tried all sorts of ways to meet the question, with the result that the only method of preventing the continuous heartburnings of the workpeople was by some mode of insurances. If Government would give them an opportunity of submitting such a scheme to a Select Committee it would be fairly considered. It had been asked why the opponents of the Bill as it stood did not put their views on paper and let them be discussed in Committee of the Whole House; but he could see no force in such a suggestion, because in such Committee there was no opportunity of examining witnesses, and hon. Members who only kept domestic servants had no opportunity of gaining information as to the work of miners, who spent the greater part of their time underground, with nothing more to guide them in the conduct of their work than the dim and glimmering light of safety-lamps. In Committee of the Whole House there would only be a scramble for Amendments, and nothing like justice could be done. The Government, with their large majority, would affirm the principle of the Bill. Some gentlemen said the Bill would not be so bad as he feared, because employers generally of both political Parties believed that no Government would do such a gross piece of injustice as this Bill would involve. But now that those people who felt confidence in the protection of the House saw that the House was moving in so dangerous a direction, they saw it was time to realize their position. The feeling against the Bill was thus growing every day, and the numerous Petitions against it showed that people were getting alarmed. One firm, with a capital of £3,650,000, who employed many thousand workpeople, had, in their Petition against the Bill, stated that it would render it difficult, if not impossible, to compete successfully with foreign nations, and that all coal and iron property in this country would be very largely depreciated in value. Another argument he held against the Bill was that it would inflict injustice upon a large number of persons who had invested their money in mining property, which would be largely depreciated in value if the Bill passed.

Mr. Knowles

The Prime Minister, a few days ago, speaking on the proposal to give local option as to the sale of intoxicating liquors, admitted that if such option were given, the question of compensating the publicans whose property was depreciated in value would have to be considered. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman would be prepared with a proposal for the compensation of mineowners, whose property would be rendered almost valueless if the Bill were passed in its present form? The present system of insurance was all very well; but one great difficulty in working provident societies was that the men often went away to some other locality where such societies did not exist. Besides, the insurances were not like those against death or old age. The men were assessed at a very low rate in order to cover the risk of accident. If a man insured, again, for a railway journey, he paid his insurance money for his journey, and if he did not get injured he did not get anything returned to him. Again, that was lost and scattered to the wind, and, of course, rather fortunate for him. So, workmen running risks paid their quota towards those who had not been equally fortunate with themselves. If they could, by legislation, compel men and masters, because masters wanted more compulsion than the men, to accept the principle, provident institutions would cover a far wider area than they did at present. For instance, it was every man's duty to educate his children; but they found the people did not accept the moral obligation, and they had to pass an Education Act in order to compel parents to do so. Then, again, every man was under a moral obligation not to overwork his wife or his children; but it was found that many traded on them, and Parliament stepped in and said—"We won't permit you to trade upon them and work them more than they can stand." He thought there would, therefore, be no injustice in masters saying to their men—"We engage you in a dangerous occupation, and you shall contribute your 1*d.* or your 2*d.* per week," the masters, at the same time, being compelled to do the same. Was it any hardship that a man should be told—"You shall pay 1*d.* or 2*d.* per week in order to make provision for yourself and family in case of injury during your hazardous employment, or, if killed, to provide for your widow and orphans?" There was never any hardship nor anything degrading in such a course. Unless such a system were made compulsory, the masters could never be induced to contribute their quota, although he was convinced that they were willing to do what was right in the matter. Workpeople would do what was honest if they were led in the proper direction; it was not they who wished for this Bill, but only the agitators who had persuaded them that this Bill would make them more comfortable and more independent. Where the workpeople understood the question they did not want this Bill. He heard the other day from a man who, having been offered £100 by a railway company for damages sustained in a railway accident, went to law and recovered £105, only to find that the whole of that sum was swallowed up by the lawyer's bill. Many such cases would be met with if this Bill became law. It might be said that the evil of litigation would cure itself in time; but, in the meantime, how much misery and loss would have been sustained! A Select Committee, it was said, meant delay; but if preparations were made for the inquiry during the Recess, there was no reason why the Report should not be presented by Easter or Whitsuntide at the latest, when more time would remain for legislation than was afforded now. Nobody would suffer from the postponement, and the only loss would be one year's crop of lawsuits. He fully agreed in the remarks made by the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease), and believed that 19 out of every 20 men were indisposed for any extension of the law, or, in fact, wanted the present Bill at all. It was only through one or two going amongst them, representing that they wanted to obtain something that they would never realize or be kept independent in the case of accident, that a number had been induced to wish for it. He believed that the working classes would rather have some mode of insurance, so as to have a certainty, than to have to be dragged through Courts of Law. The amount of money which would be spent in litigation, but which might be employed in the creation of an insurance fund, would be enormous. The fact was, that the Bill had been hurriedly brought into the House. He did not believe that either the late or the present Government saw the full bearings of it when they introduced it. He hoped a Select Committee would be appointed to consider whether some alternative scheme, more just both to the working classes and to the employers, could not be devised. The hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) had compared this measure to the Mines Regulation Act, and had remarked that when the latter Act was passed all the coalowners thought they were going to be ruined, whereas the result was that they were none the worse off. When the Mines Regulation Act was originally brought forward in its crude form it was a dangerous Bill, though nothing like so ruinous as this. After four years' discussion in that House the Mines Regulation Act was brought into its present state. In that case there was a limit to the liability which, under the present Bill, would be unlimited. He need not point out that no trade could prosper where masters and men were in constant litigation. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester knew what would be the effect of this Bill he would not press it. The right hon. Gentleman's position seemed to be that of an election agent. He had got a Bill to pass and he must pass it, and he had got the Law Officers of the Crown to assist him. If those learned Gentlemen would put aside their law and apply their common sense to the subject, they would feel as strongly about the Bill as he (Mr. Knowles) did. The result of passing the Bill would not be to the credit of the right hon. Gentleman. It would do no good to anybody, but would injure both employers and employed. If the Government refused a Select Committee, they would lose a golden opportunity. He believed that before such a Committee evidence could be given to satisfy them that an alternative scheme of insurance would be better, not only for the employers but for the employed. In conclusion, the hon. Gentleman moved—

"That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, and that it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to consider whether efficient provision cannot be made for all persons injured during their employment, and for the widows and orphans of those killed by accident by an insurance fund contributed by masters and workmen, and whether the same would not be more beneficial to the workmen than the right of action proposed to be given by the Bill."

Mr. Knowles

MR. SPEAKER said, the first Question to put to the House would be that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, and the second part of the Amendment as to the Instructions to the Committee could afterwards be put if the Amendment was carried.

MR. KNOWLES said, he would move it in any way consistent with the Rules of the House. He would, then, simply propose that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and if that proposal were assented to he should be happy to agree to any Instructions the Government might think right to give the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee,"—
(Mr. Knowles),

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN supposed that there was no Member to whom the House would listen more willingly and patiently than to the hon. Member for Wigan who had just sat down; because it was within the knowledge of the House that the hon. Member was himself largely interested in the trade and in the industry of the country, had great practical acquaintance with this particular question, and a knowledge of the subject which the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) candidly and honestly acknowledged that he did not possess; and, moreover, it was well known to many that his relations with his workpeople had always been of a most honourable nature. He was, however, somewhat in doubt whether the hon. Member was speaking against the Bill or was speaking against time. He could say, however, on behalf of the Government, that they had no right—and they certainly had no inclination—to complain of the fullest and most careful discussion of the measure. They knew very well that it touched great interests, and the trade of this country was so complicated that it was difficult at first sight, without very careful consideration, to see what was the exact incidence of a Bill of this kind, and to what degree the various interests might be affected by it. But he was bound to say that it appeared to him that the greatness of the interests concerned made the Representatives of those interests in the House altogether too timid. They had the hon. Member for Wigan telling them that it would render the great properties invested in mines and similar undertakings almost worthless. He could only say that if the hon. Gentleman could show that one-tenth of the accusations he brought forth were justified, he (Mr. Chamberlain) would be the first one to try and induce his Colleagues to withdraw the Bill from the House. Sidney Smith used to say that Consols were the greatest fools in Europe. He would not say that of the interests concerned; but he would say that whenever this question was touched they were always met by exaggerated apprehensions. The hon. Member had confessed, with regard to the Mines Regulation Act, that he and those who worked against the Bill had entertained exaggerated notions and apprehensions.

MR. KNOWLES explained, that what he did say was that he objected to the crude Bill as it came into the House; but, after four years' discussion, it was made a different measure.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN was glad to hear that the Bill as it left the House was so satisfactory. That was the first time he had heard a mineowner say so. He knew very well that the hon. Member declared at the time that the Bill would be the ruin of the country, inasmuch as it would so hamper the home industries that their workmen and the employers would have no chance with competition abroad. The hon. Gentleman had said that this Bill was 20 times worse than the Mines Regulation Bill. Well, the extra cost thrown upon the mineowner under the Mines Regulation Act was 6d. per ton; some put it at 1s. It had been estimated that the extra cost to the mineowner under this Bill would be ¼d. per ton, or 1-24th of the liability imposed by the Mines Regulation Act. He was right in reminding the House that the same objections were taken to the Factory Acts when they were first brought before the House; and he might quote some expressions of opinion in reference to legislation with regard to the merchant shipping, and also for the security of the public on railways. They knew, however, that those industries had not suffered, but had gone on developing and improving; and he ventured to think that it would be so in the interests now represented to be in such a state of alarm by the hon. Member for Wigan. He thought they must say that the discussion on this measure, protracted as it was, cleared the ground and paved the way for further progress. They were able to estimate the objections taken to the Bill, together with the alternatives proposed for the acceptance of the House. One thing was very marked, and that was that everybody agreed that something must be done, and that a clear case had been made out for an alteration of the law, and that the sooner the alteration was made the better would it be for all interests concerned. It had been made clear that the objections to the Bill were practically confined to two classes—the representatives of the railway interest in the first place, and of the mining interest in the second. The great bulk of the trading interests of the country were perfectly silent on the subject. ["No, no!"] Well, he had seen objections taken by the general trade of the country to the Bill known as that of the hon. Member for Hastings, but none to the Bill before the House. But the case for an alteration of the law was precisely the strongest in those two cases from which the greatest objections came. The agitation began in connection with the railway interest, and arose from that almost monstrous interpretation of the law which recognized as fellow-servants the workingman earning 30s. a week and the man drawing £2,000 or £3,000 a-year as general manager. They had been told on a previous occasion by the hon. Member for Wigan that there were, on the whole, 500,000 persons employed in the mining industries of this country, out of which number about 100,000 persons were annually killed or temporarily maimed annually by accident! So that, the whole of those so employed were killed or disabled every five years. There must be something wrong in the system under which such an enormous waste of human life and under which such an enormous amount of human suffering became possible, and a change might surely be able to remedy this state of things. The objections taken to the Bill were really to the original draft as it was introduced to the House and before the modifications, which were promised by the President of the Local Government Board in his opening speech, were made. No doubt, the original Bill created some exaggerated alarm; but the ground for this had been removed by the alterations. These alterations had all been indicated by his right hon. Friend in his opening speech, and, without affecting the main principle of the Bill, they were intended to define its application more clearly. The Government had limited the definition of the term "superintendent" until it came to be a person delegated with authority—a master or a person having others under his control, in contrast to persons employed in manual labour. The hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had told them there was no principle in such a definition; but, for his part, he thought otherwise, as he felt confident there was a real distinction between persons in that position of authority, acting in lieu of the master, and for whom the master was expected to make himself almost personally liable, and in whose selection he must exercise particular care and attention, in contrast with the ordinary workman who could in no way exercise control. Then, they had made another modification, to which the hon. Member for Wigan had not alluded, which had a most important bearing on all the objections which had been urged against the Bill—they had limited the amount of liability. They had left no longer any room for extortionate demands; and what they had done was in the interest of the workman as well as of the employer. There was no longer any reason to expect any difficulty would arise from extortionate claims being made upon the employers. The alternative proposals made by the opponents of the Bill would, if accepted, impose much greater liability on the trade and industry of the country than was contemplated by the Bill itself as it now stood. Take, for instance, the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry. He had urged that the law could not be left as it now was, and that he was willing to accept the principle of the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), if he was granted certain concessions. Now, what were those concessions which the hon. and learned

Member for Coventry said he was willing to adopt? The Bill which the hon. Member for Stafford introduced would make employers liable for acts of negligence of every workman in their employ. The hon. Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. D. Davies), for instance, had 4,000 workmen in his employ; and, therefore, if the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford was introduced, the hon. Member for Cardiganshire would become liable for the acts of negligence of the whole of his 4,000 workmen, whereas the Bill before the House would only make the hon. Member liable for 50 out of the 4,000. The hon. and learned Member for Coventry asked that he should receive concessions limiting the compensation to £150, whereas the present proposal was three years' wages. The average wages of the county would not produce more than £200; and, therefore, all that the hon. and learned Member asked in return for raising the liability about 80 times was that damages should be reduced from £200 to £150. That was sufficient to show that hon. Members did not really understand the effect of the present Bill. Then, with respect to the alternative of "compulsory insurance," the hon. Member (Mr. Knowles) said he was willing to pay £1 for £1 paid by his workmen, and was willing that that should be not for accidents occasioned by negligence, but for all accidents to which workmen were liable. But he also said that the Bill did not deal with one-twentieth of those accidents. Thus, while he said the Bill was going to ruin all the mining industry of the Kingdom, he was willing to undertake a liability which could be proved authentically to be ten times greater than the liability which could be incurred under the Bill. Could those arguments be serious? Were they really presented with a view to acceptance by the House, or were they only put forward to delay the progress of the Bill? Of one thing he was certain. If their proposals were carried into effect, the persons whom they represented would say that the Government proposed to scourge with whips, but their Representatives proposed to scourge with scorpions. There was clearly an admitted grievance on the part of workmen, although the extent of that grievance was open to difference of opinion.

Mr. Chamberlain

Among the grievances which existed there was another which had not been considered, and that grievance was that there was a positive immunity granted to large employers as compared with smaller employers. [Mr. MACDONALD: Hear, hear!] If the smaller employer extended his business, and substituted for his own personal inspection that of managers, the workmen were left without any compensation from the manager in case of an accident, and so the employer, at present, escaped all liability. Now, if it was admitted such a grievance existed, surely it was wise to attempt to remedy it, and it was almost dangerous to meet much a grievance with the answer non possumus. Agitation continued, the House was stormed, and hasty legislation was the consequence, which was much more injurious to the interests involved than it would have been if the matter had been taken up in time. There were now before the House three separate proposals. First, there was the proposal of the hon. Member for Stafford, and, as they had been urged to speak frankly on the matter, his right hon. Friend said, in the plainest possible terms, that the Government were unable to accept the principle of that Bill. He was not quite sure that there was not some ground for difference between a stranger and a workman. A stranger was entirely outside the operations; a workman was, to a certain extent, a partner in an enterprise, and to a certain extent he might be called upon to share the risk. On this ground, and on the ground that a principle which would involve so indefinite a liability would interfere with trade and enterprise, they had found themselves unable to accept it. The hon. Member for Stafford had not been over anxious to press his conclusion, and he had written a letter in which he had pointed out the nature and extent of the grievance of the workman, and had suggested that it should be met by making answerable for negligence not only the employer, but all those exercising a delegated authority. That modified view of the case was the one which they had endeavoured to meet by the Bill. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) would also abolish the distinction between the workman and the stranger, and he would do it, not by elevating the workman to the position of the stranger, but

by depressing the stranger to the position of the workman. He would lessen the existing liability of the employer, and would not extend it in the case of the workman. No one but the hon. Member had been bold enough to support his view. One effect of that would be that the Railway Companies would be relieved from liability in respect of accidents; and he did not think the public would travel in peace of mind if they knew that they were deprived of the security furnished by the fact that a Company would have to pay a heavy penalty for injury due to negligence. The third proposal was the Bill of the Government, and what it did was to lessen a practical grievance. It was not possible to obtain finality in this or any matter; but if the Bill were passed the case for interference would be very much weaker than it was at present. Now, what real objection could be urged against the Bill as it now stood? The most serious was that urged by the hon. Member for Wigan—that it would encourage litigation. To lessen the risk of that the Government entreated the assistance of the House; and if there were any way in which the liability to litigation could be reduced, the Government would be glad to accept it. But the general argument was an argument against all concession of legal right, for, if there were no law, there would be no litigation. They could not have a legal remedy without opening the way to litigation. Whether, in practice, the amount of litigation would be as serious as was supposed he was inclined to doubt. One or two questions might arise; but as many decisions would settle them once for all. The probability of litigation had been immensely lessened, if not altogether removed, by the proposal to limit the maximum amount of compensation. The largest sum a workman could receive would not generally exceed £200, and in a vast number of cases it would be much less. No doubt, the employer would make an effort to come to some agreement; and as a sum of from £20 to £50 would represent the difference between the claim and the offer, it was not likely that sensible people on either side would waste the money that should go into the pocket of one party or the other. Whether the Bill would do anything to expose us still further to foreign introduced to the House and before the modifications, which were promised by the President of the Local Government Board in his opening speech, were made. No doubt, the original Bill created some exaggerated alarm; but the ground for this had been removed by the alterations. These alterations had all been indicated by his right hon. To lessen the risk of that the Government entreated the assistance of the House; and if there were any way in which the liability to litigation could be reduced, the Government would be glad to accept it. But the general argument was an argument against all concession of legal right, for, if there were no law, there would be no litigation. They could not have a legal remedy without opening the way to litigation. Whether, in practice, the amount of litigation would be as serious as was supposed he was inclined to doubt. One or two questions might arise; but as many decisions would settle them once for all. The probability of litigation had been immensely lessened, if not altogether removed, by the proposal to limit the maximum amount of compensation. The largest sum a workman could receive would not generally exceed £200, and in a vast number of cases it would be much less. No doubt, the employer would make an effort to come to some agreement; and as a sum of from £20 to £50 would represent the difference between the claim and the offer, it was not likely that sensible people on either side would waste the money that should go into the pocket of one party or the other. Whether the Bill would do anything to expose us still further to foreign consistent with disapproval of the Fourth Schedule. A few days ago he had the honour to preside at a meeting of the Council of the General Association of Church School Managers and Teachers; and while the meeting was desirous of promoting the education of the children of the elementary schools, it was unanimously of opinion, and had drawn up a Petition to that effect, that at present the interests of those children were really injured by the Fourth Schedule. What they desired to see was facilities afforded to the children of elementary schools for continuing their education in secondary schools.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I am glad the noble Earl opposite (Earl Nelson) has made the explanation he has now given, because it is undoubtedly true that a general impression prevails out-of-doors that the vote of this House the other night was a "re-actionary" vote—a vote in contradistinction to and calculated to arrest the progress of education. I am convinced that the majority of those Peers who voted on that occasion have no wish to lower the standard of education. The fault was their own, both from their speeches and their votes; and I am, I confess, very much puzzled to understand how the noble Duke could have concurred in a vote, not for the Amendment of the Fourth Schedule, not for the preservation of those modifications of it which he himself initiated, and for which there is much to be said—I am puzzled to make out how he could have voted in favour of striking out the whole of the Fourth Schedule altogether. The allusion of the noble Earl (Earl Nelson) has also convinced me that the views I hold on the subject have been misunderstood, and I am confirmed in that by the fact that the noble Earl on the Bench below me (Earl Fortescue), who voted on that side the other night, has sent me a pamphlet on the subject, with almost every word of which I find I concur. There were two distinct propositions in that pamphlet, and one is that the middle-class and secondary education shall not be paid for out of the rates. In that opinion I entirely concur. I hold it as strongly as any noble Lord on the other side of the House that we should, as far as possible, not provide for secondary or what is called middle-class education out of the rates, which are intended for primary education; but then, my Lords, there was a second proposition which was entirely distinct, and that was that in primary schools you should not teach any elements except the elements of reading, writing, and arithmetic, a wholly separate proposition, and from that I wholly dissent. I hold that there are many subjects of which you can teach the elements in primary schools. That is a totally different proposition from the others to which I have referred. Perhaps the noble Lord opposite will say, how do you distinguish between secondary or middle-class education and primary education? There are but two ways of distinguishing between these two subjects, and they are by definition as to age, and also by limitation of expense. The attempt to separate the two kinds of education by exclusion of particular subjects is to my mind wholly futile and erroneous, because there is no subject of which you cannot reach the elements, and any distinction breaks down entirely if you follow the principle laid down by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon), because I believe he is the author of the paragraph in the Education Code which introduces class subjects. The definition of class subjects is this—subjects that can be taught by means of reading lessons. Now, what can be taught by means of reading lessons, or what is there that cannot be taught by means of reading? Hardly any. To refer to what I have already said on the subject of education in Scotland—and I can say this, that in the course of reading lessons given in that country all sorts of subjects are taught to the children with great success—I shall never forget, about 20 years ago, going into a little school in one of the Western Highlands of Scotland. It was a school which externally would have raised the horror of the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council. It would not have suited any of the rules laid down by him. It was what was called a dry stone building, with a thatched roof and a mud floor. On going into the school I found in it a number of children, extremely poor, reading a lesson with extraordinary intelligence of expression. One of the first subjects given to the children to read me was a description of how metallic ores were treated before the smelt-

Whole House. He had already said that the hon. Member for Wigan had frankly admitted that the effect of referring the Bill to a Select Committee would be to make legislation impossible this Session. The hon. and learned Member for Coventry had said he would use his best endeavours to secure an immediate Report, so that they might proceed in the present Session. But the hon. and learned Baronet knew that he could not necessarily control the action of those who might happen to be his Colleagues. It was perfectly absurd to suppose that if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee the result would be other than he had described. If that were so they would have an agitation, because this was a question which interested a great number of people. The hon. Member for Wigan had spoken about a great number of Petitions having been presented against the Bill. Did the hon. Gentleman recollect that there had been a much larger number presented in favour of the Bill, and that it would be much easier to get a great number of signatures in favour of the Bill than against it? On the one hand, they had the almost unanimous opinion of the working classes of the country in favour of the Bill; and on the other hand, they had a more or less divided opinion on the part of the employers. He did not say that the Bill was perfect; but the Government were ready to come to the consideration of Amendments in Committee with a frank and open mind. He trusted that they would be allowed to make progress. A Select Committee was a natural resource of a Government that did not want to legislate, and of a Parliament that was weary of legislation. This Government or this Parliament was not yet tired of legislation. If Parliament would approach the question with a hearty goodwill they might settle it, at all events, for a time, and they might remove great injustices and glaring irregularities, and make a real contribution to the contentment and also to the security of the working population.

MR. SCHREIBER, who had given Notice of an Amendment that the House should go into Committee on the Bill that day three months, said: Sir, Her Majesty's Government, I am certain, will not complain of any amount of discussion which this measure may receive.

First, because this particular Bill has never had a second reading; and next, because, as has been already seen, discussion helps the Government to understand the consequences of its own proposals. Now, Sir, when this question was first brought under the notice of this House, we were told, in peremptory tones, that "it was time we made up our minds and passed a Bill." It will hardly be believed that when a Member of the Government went so far as to address that language to the House of Commons, the Government itself had not performed the preliminary exercise of making up its own mind, as is shown in the altered provisions of the re-committed Bill before us. Well, then, after the very interesting and instructive debate of last Friday on the Bill, I cannot deny myself the hope that fresh light may again have broken on the minds of Her Majesty's Ministers. For example, there was the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson), who never addresses this House without instructing it, and who is always so sensible that, if I did not know he was an eminent lawyer, I should have thought he was a layman. Well, the hon. and learned Gentleman pleaded—and pleaded passionately—for three things. First, that the Bill should go to a Select Committee; next, that a maximum amount, say, of £100, should be named for compensation in the Bill; thirdly, that the principle of mutual assurance should receive recognition in the Bill. His prayer was, at the time, refused; and if, having considered the matter in the interval, Her Majesty's Ministers still persist in that refusal, I see nothing for it but to labour with the same persistence for the rejection of the Bill. My first objection, Sir, to this Bill is founded upon considerations of time. We are still too near to the late General Election. We ought to wait till that event has receded further into the distance, and we are able to legislate in colder blood. Brought forward at this juncture, the measure has too much the appearance of a "bill" drawn upon the capitalists of the country to pay an electioneering debt. Further, if, in the present state of Public Business and at this period of the Session it is impossible to make a good measure of this Bill, then every hour spent upon it will be an hour wasted. But, Sir, I go further, and I say that whatever the state of Public Business, whatever the period of the Session, and whatever the time at our command, we shall never be able to make a good measure of this Bill. For what is its real character? It is a Bill, Sir, to harass the employer, to multiply accidents, to vex capital, to reduce wages, and, generally, to "kill the goose which lays the golden eggs." It is, then, a Bill most strongly to be resisted in the interests of the very class who have forced this question to the front. Now, I do not know, Sir, what pledges hon. Gentlemen on either side of the House may have given to their constituents; but I gave none on this, or any other question, unless, indeed, it were that I would do my best to prevent the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government from ruining the great interests of the country, and which pledge I now discharge by my opposition to this Bill. What, then, is the position of the employer? His interests and the requirements of the existing law already impose upon him extreme carefulness in the prevention of accidents, which have their most fertile source in the carelessness of the men. And what does this Bill do? It extends the liability of the employer by setting up a division and sub-division of delegated authority; it increases his risks by tending to make the men less careful; and, having extended his liability and increased his risks, it subjects him to heavy fines, levied under these new and most inequitable conditions. Now, Sir, that the liability of the employer will be increased by the delegation and sub-delegation of authority is evident already; that the workman will be made less careful is not, perhaps, so apparent; but what other effect can the knowledge have than that, in the event of an accident, he or his representatives will be compensated out of the employer's pocket? And this is not the only way. The Bill, if it is to come into general operation, will be fatal to the system of mutual insurance, which is the best security for increased carefulness, by making it the interest of each man to keep a watch upon his fellow. This Bill, Sir, and mutual insurance are alternatives which exclude each other. If this Bill is to prevail it will be fatal to mutual insurance, which is educating the workman in providence and carefulness. If mutual insurance is to prevail, why are we wasting our time upon this Bill on this, the 6th of July? And now, a few words with respect to the real bone of contention—the payment of compensation. I shall be told that if almost all accidents have their origin in the carelessness of the workmen, the employer has only to prove it and he will not be fined. But how is he to prove it, when all the witnesses are retained on the other side? Besides, I dare say that to the Law Officers of the Crown, who spend their lives in the extatic contemplation of interminable law-suits, nothing seems so natural, or even agreeable, as that an employer should carry his workmen into the County Court; but I tell the hon. and learned Gentleman, that the relations which now obtain between the best of masters and their men are so strained and difficult that it only requires the able assistance of a few local attorneys to make them altogether impossible. In this matter, Sir, no greater evil can befall the men than to hand them over to that parasite of their class, the pettyfogging attorney. Well, then, is the employer the person who ought to bear this fine? The Government will say, of course, he is; but this Government displays a wonderful aptitude for being liberal with other people's money, and strongly reminds me of the man in Sydney Smith's story, who was so moved with a charity sermon that he emptied both his neighbour's pockets into the plate. For myself, I shall think that the equities of the question are better understood when I hear what compensation the State offers to an employer in the event of his stock, his plant, his mine, his property being injured by an accident having its origin in the carelessness of the men. Can, then, employers bear this fine? In the present state of trade they cannot. With one conspicuous exception, better known to me than to any hon. Member of this House, but well known to many hon. Members of this House, the ironmasters of South Wales, during the late depression of trade, closed their works rather than continue an unprofitable manufacture. Since this Government was formed we have had again a heavy fall in the prices of coal and iron. Let these gentlemen once think that the Government proposes to lay upon them burdens greater than they can bear, and they may close their works again—this time without the conspicuous exception. And if they do I would have the Prime Minister look to it, for he will hardly realize his Estimates of Customs and Excise. That, Sir, would be a wholesome lesson, and would teach the right hon. Gentleman the obligations of the State to those great pioneers of industry, whose capital must be profitably employed if the taxes are to be paid. Once more, Sir, from what fund is the employer to take this fine? If out of the labour fund of the employed, wages must fall. If, as I think more accurate, out of the pockets of the consumers, prices must rise, and we shall lose our markets. In either case this Bill should be opposed, not so much on behalf of the employer whom it fines, as of the workman whom it will ruin. And now, Sir, a few words as to the “muddle” into which all Public Business is getting—this Bill included. It is due to the utter incapacity of Her Majesty's Government to understand the House of Commons, or their unwillingness to take this House into their confidence. Three measures are now before us which this House detests. I need not name them; but this is one of them. Between the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary there would seem to be a division of labour and a distribution of parts. The latter threatens the House of Commons, and the former coerces his own majority. But Party allegiance may be strained until it snaps; and to threaten this House is the surest way to stop all legislation. Let me recall the experience of 1866, when we deposed a Minister who threatened us, and changed a Government rather than pass a Bill which we disliked. And let me invite the right hon. Gentleman to take some account of the wishes of his faithful followers, and of the stubborn resistance of his opponents, and allow this Bill to go to a Select Committee.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN thought this was a question on which they ought to attach weight to the opinion of those who knew something about the relations between employers and employed. In the speeches which had been delivered he failed to find any justification for the legislation which was now being proposed. The President of the Board of Trade alluded very slightly to the Select Committee which investigated this question. He did not wonder at this, because the Report of the Committee was wholly adverse to the lines laid down in this Bill. The Committee reported that no case had been made out for any alteration of the law relating to the liability of employers to their workmen for injury in the course of their employment except in three cases—that of Corporations, that of employers who delegated their authority, and that of contractors, whose men were considered not to be in common employment with those who were engaged in similar work in the same place. With these exceptions, the Committee stated that no case was made out for legislation; and yet the Government were now proposing, on their own Motion, and, as he thought without justification, to alter the existing law on wholly different principles. The President of the Board of Trade seemed to think the law had been altered in 1837; but that was not the opinion of the Committee. He wanted to know what justification there was for the Government, without any investigation, coming forward and proposing this tremendous alteration of the law? They adopted the crude measure of the hon. Member for Hastings (Mr. Brassey); but, immediately after throwing it on the Table, they saw the necessity of taking it back and introducing into it material alterations. The President of the Board of Trade had said that those who asked that the matter should be duly considered put forward a dilatory plea. He denied altogether that such was the case. He was not in the House when the Home Secretary characterized those who proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee as “ringleaders,” and he was glad he was not present. This was a very grave question. They were dealing with the whole of the industries of this great country, introducing new relations between employers and employed in opposition to the Report of a strong Committee; and were those who asked for further consideration to be told they were putting forward a “dilatory plea,” and to be called “ringleaders” in preventing legislation for the good of the working classes? He denied that they were taking any course but what would be beneficial to the working classes. His impression, from what the right hon. Gentleman said, was that he did not see the full extent to which the present liability of employers would be extended. By the 3rd section, even as modified, if a man were injured through the negligence of another who had any authority delegated to him, the owner was to be liable for the negligence of one over whom he had not the slightest control. He went the entire length of the Committee which reported to the House, and would go further. The person selected by the master to superintend might be regarded as representing the master, and the master ought to be held responsible for negligence on his part. But how to define "agency" was one of the most difficult points which could be conceived. Anyone who had experience of Election Petitions would understand that, and it was still more difficult to define agency in the case of mines. The right hon. Gentleman who spoke last spoke lightly of the crop of litigation to which this Bill would give rise; but that was what he (Mr. Hussey Vivian) most objected to. That was a consideration which might recommend the measure to the favour of the lawyers, who lived by litigation, but not to him, who regarded litigation with horror and detestation. He had had a long business life, and throughout the whole of his career had looked upon litigation as something horrible; but that was not the lawyer's view of it, nor was it to be expected that he should regard his bread and butter with horror. A lawyer, therefore, was not a proper judge of the propriety of passing a law likely to entail endless litigation between employers and workmen, nor was he capable of pronouncing a sound opinion upon it; and when he interfered between them and their workmen, and caused serious questions to arise between them, then he (Mr. Hussey Vivian) must deprecate and dissent from such legislation. It had been pointed out by the Member for Stafford that an employer would be bound to prove that the injury was not caused by the act of his agent. But a master must do his best to uphold his agent, otherwise his influence over the workmen would be destroyed. He hoped it would not be supposed that he desired to escape any pecuniary liability which he ought properly to come under; but he strongly objected to the indefinite character of the liability which was likely to be created by this Bill. The Bill proposed that the injured man was to be compensated at the rate of three years' earnings. How were they to define three years' earnings? He had known wages to change to the extent of 100 per cent. If the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) were adopted, then they would have something to go upon as to what their utmost liability would be, and they might provide against it by means of insurance. It constantly happened that men exhausted their capital in opening mines; little was required to carry them on afterwards. Under this Bill such men might be absolutely ruined. The Government were acting without investigation, and with very little knowledge of the subject. The community of feeling between employer and employed was of a sacred character, and cognate with the relations of a family; and unless master and man pulled heartily together success would not be attained. They must not suppose that any man would be so inhuman as wilfully to endanger life. To allege that this Bill would prevent casualties was to allege a thing that would not hold water for a moment. Speaking for himself, he could say the most bitter moments of his life were those in which he witnessed the fearful results of an explosion in one of his own pits, and saw the unfortunate men carried off in their coffins. Whenever such a calamity occurred, the owners were ready of their own accord to do ten times as much for the relief of the afflicted as this Bill sought to impose upon them. It was not the question of pecuniary compensation they objected to, but the sowing of discord. He did not think sufficient consideration had been given to the question of insurance. A contribution of, perhaps, $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent of the wages, met by an adequate contribution from employers, would be sufficient to deal with all accidents. There would be no difficulty in dealing with individuals, and less in dealing with districts, the fund being managed by the workmen themselves. Already one-fourth of the colliers of the country, or 120,000, were embraced in existing insurance arrangements; and, if one-fourth, why not all? The Government had a golden opportunity of accepting a provision of this kind. The masters were ready to come forward and to assist handsomely in such a scheme; the lessors of mines were as ~~ready~~ interested as the lessees, and probably would assist also. This was a paltry Bill, because it would deal with only one-tenth of the accidents that occurred, and it would probably waste in litigation more than it would secure for the injured. Was it to promote discord and yet to provide for only 10 per cent of the accidents, that Government desired to legislate? To do so little and to create such difficulties, was not worthy of a strong Government like the present. If the Government would take up the subject comprehensively, they would find their supporters united; but if they persisted with this Bill, they would be endeavouring to force upon their supporters a measure distasteful to them in order to reverse the legal precedents of centuries that had come down to this country from the time of the Romans. Supposing the House went into Committee, every clause would be fought; and, by-and-bye, the Bill would go to "another place" with all the marks of a battle-field in a civil war, strewn with the corpses of friends and brethren. For these reasons, he urged that it should be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD thought it would be better to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, but not for the reasons just urged. He took it that, in the main, they must start with the assumption that the law in regard to common employment must be altered; and the only question really was whether the Bill carried out that alteration. The difficulty in regard to a scheme of national insurance was to make it sufficiently far-reaching to comprise all branches of the community. He remembered a case in which a painter was injured by being knocked off a ladder by a railway servant moving a turntable, and, although they were strangers, they were held to be in the same employment. In the same way, the guard of a train starting from York might be held to be in the same employment as a pointsman in London, and the guard could not obtain compensation for an accident caused by the pointsman. He thought an alteration of the law was imperatively called for, and the only doubt which he had was whether the Bill efficiently carried out that alteration. He could not admit that the alteration of the technical rule of law was inconsistent with the Report of the Committee. The unreasonableness of the rule had become more urgent in modern times through the multiplication of great Companies, in which there was no individual master to be negligent. He should be disposed to affirm that where there was a person who represented the master, although he had no pecuniary interest, yet, if intrusted with authority, he should be held responsible. As the Bill was drawn, it left a question much wider than that to be disposed of. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down seemed to entertain a very low opinion of lawyers, for he regarded them more in the phase of instigators of litigation than in the phase in which they more frequently appeared—that of dissuading their clients from engaging in litigation. It was they who, in the exercise of their profession, saw the injustice of such laws as this, and were most anxious to have that injustice done away with. The true view should be to consider the principle of the Bill as established, and that then the Bill should go to a Select Committee—not to inquire into the principle as to whether there should be an alteration of the law, but as to its operative completion. If they insisted upon the Bill going forward in its present form, there would not be time to pass it.

MR. WIGGIN supported the Amendment. He had a short time since attended a meeting in Birmingham of over 200 large employers of labour, and they passed a resolution to the effect that it was very desirable that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, in order that its provisions might be carefully considered, and calling on their Representatives in Parliament to vote for a proposal to that effect. That feeling was not confined to the employers in the Midland Counties, but extended to the whole country and to Scotland, because the opinion prevailed that the Bill was being pressed on with undue haste, and that it ought not to become law without being fully inquired into. He trusted that the Government would yield on this matter, and that the Bill would return from the Select Committee so amended that he could give it his cordial support.

MR. M'INTYRE said, he thought that an employer of labour ought to stand in the same position towards those he employed as he did towards the outside world, and ought to be equally responsible in case of accident in the one case as in the other. The workman had no opportunity of selecting his fellow-workmen, and the negligence of his fellow-workmen, through which he was injured, ought to be held to be injury by his employer. He submitted that there was no ground for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, and that there was nothing in question which could not be arranged in Committee of the House. He contended, also, that the Bill was in strict accord with the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1871.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he wished to represent respectfully to the House that they had arrived at a point when they were perfectly ripe for a decision. The question before them was not the whole matter that was involved in this very important Bill, but the comparatively simple and narrow question whether the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had given his reasons with great brevity and simplicity for thinking that that course ought to be adopted; but, whether hon. Members leaned to the affirmative or to the negative, he put it to the House, as men of business, that the time had arrived when they were ripe for deciding the matter. The subject, he would almost say, hardly admitted of extended debate, for what were the principal pleas that had been put forward? Some hon. Members had spoken in support of the proposal for a Select Committee, but with a frank avowal that they were opposed to the principle of the Bill, and they desired to promote whatever was likely to avert its enactment. Those Gentlemen were, undoubtedly, the minority of the House. The great majority of those who were friendly to a Select Committee, and of those who deprecated such a reference, were, however, agreed in the admission, like the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, that an alteration in the law was desirable, and that it ought to be brought about with every possible despatch. Setting aside those who were opposed entirely to the principle of the Bill, he thought there were two classes of persons, two kinds of reasons, to be considered in favour of the proposal to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. Some

hon. Gentlemen thought that the reason was to be found in pointing to a proposition like that contained in the 3rd clause, which fixed a certain number of years passed in employment, and the wages received in those years, as the rule for determining the maximum of compensation that was to be paid, and urged that that was not a good principle, but that a sum of money should be substituted. That might be, or it might not be—he did not give any opinion on the point at present. It was a question, however, which would be considered with the greatest advantage in Committee of the the Whole House. Moreover, that was a question which, if considered by a Select Committee, could only be decided there on the same class of considerations that would present themselves to the minds of every Member of that House; and if it were so considered and decided, the probability was that the Bill would come back again only to promote renewed discussion. He ventured to add that not only would they gain nothing by the reference to the Committee upstairs, but that they would lose a great deal. Much more thorough and varied light would be thrown upon the Bill when discussed in the House than it would be if the work were undertaken by a number of Gentlemen sitting in Committee round a table. But the real argument, after all, which had been advanced in favour of referring the measure to a Select Committee, was the one which seemed to be the most conclusive against the adoption of that course. He referred to the argument that a scheme of general and, perhaps, compulsory insurance ought to be embodied in the Bill. Her Majesty's Government had no disinclination whatever to see the voluntary principle, with all the advantages which belonged to it, applied to the great object of compensation for accidents; but before being disposed to allow the fate of the Bill, so far as it depended on them, to rest on the introduction into it of a plan of that kind, they must ask themselves, as men of business, the question whether those who put forward that proposition, and were so anxious for its adoption, were themselves prepared with a plan which might be carried into effect? Now, on the contrary, there were no elements of that description. It was now five weeks since he had the honour of receiving a deputation, to which an hon. Friend behind him had referred. There were assembled at that deputation a very large number, not only of persons of the highest influence, but of the ablest men of business to be found in this country; and among those men of business was Mr. Baxter, and there was not an abler man, as far as he knew, to be found among them, and there were many of those men of business who proposed the recommendation of such a plan. But this was an abstract recommendation, and not anything like a practical scheme. It was accompanied by an intimation on the part of some that the thing might be done, and by others with expressions of misgiving and doubt whether it could be done, and with an avowal that it would be a very good thing if it could be done. Now he begged to state, with very great respect, that these were not the kind of proposals that ought to be referred to a Select Committee. In order to justify a number of Members of that House taking into their hands a consideration of that kind, it ought to be already in the shape of a practical project, framed by men of considerable authority and practical experience, instead of being, as it was, a project altogether in the air. They were far more likely to create a method of insurance against accidents if they passed this Bill, and then applied in that manner a spur to the able and vigorous intellects of the Gentlemen who had brought up the subject, than if they referred it to a Committee. As far as the Government were concerned, much as they wished that a plan of that kind should be tried, much as the Government conceived that when they were freely and voluntarily adopted between masters and workmen they were the best of any schemes that could be devised under general liability enacted by Act of Parliament, yet they could not but say that this argument as it stood was an argument against, and not for, reference to a Committee. There was another motive which weighed very much with him in thinking that they would be doing unwisely by referring the Bill to a Committee. The working men of this country were happily, to a certain extent, directly represented in that House, and they were morally and indirectly represented to a much larger extent by the intelligence and philanthropy of many Members, among whom were many great employers of labour;

but their direct representation being small, it was natural that they should view, partly, indeed, with confidence, and partly, also, with jealousy, a reference of the Bill to a Committee upstairs. To conduct an investigation with closed doors would be far less likely to carry the confidence of the working men of the country than if, in open Committee, they gave up all the time that was necessary for a careful and patient consideration of every practical proposal that might be made. For these reasons he hoped the House would decline to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, and that it would be able to arrive at a decision that evening.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, he was strongly convinced, notwithstanding the speech of the Prime Minister to the contrary, that the Bill should go to a Select Committee. The Mines Regulation Bill was rejected because the House was anxious that it should come before them in a more complete shape, as it eventually did, after being referred to what was practically a Select Committee; and he maintained that the two cases were similar. They objected, not as the Prime Minister seemed to imagine, to the 3rd clause of the Bill, but to the 3rd sub-section of the 1st clause, which had no limit in it whatever, and which made a master liable for the negligence of any person in his service to whose orders a workman was bound to conform or did conform. In conclusion, the hon. and learned Member expressed his profound regret at finding that the Government intended to press forward the Bill in its present crude condition.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN wished to know whether, in the event of this Bill going into Committee, the Government would be prepared to introduce, or to favour the introduction of, a measure on the question of a general assurance against those casualties of life which were attached to our industries, and to put an end to the Bill now before the House, provided that hereafter a measure relating to insurance was passed?

MR. GLADSTONE replied, that if a well-considered plan of insurance were submitted to the House in Committee, it would be the duty of the Government to give full consideration to the subject.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 259; Noes 130: Majority 129.—(Div. List, No. 43.)

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BILL—[BILL 221.]

(Mr. Playfair, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Frederick Cavendish.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. GLADSTONE: I propose to go into Committee pro formâ on this Bill, and I think I shall have time to state the changes which will be proposed. The regulation clauses will be amended in detail. The exemption will be reduced to £10. Farmers' land will not be included. The allowance for waste will be 6 per cent. Collection will be monthly. The standard will be 57 per cent for duty, and likewise for drawbacks on exports. The deduction from the permissive charge will be 4 per cent. The drawback to maltsters will be paid in one sum. The private brewer will be allowed to brew only on his own premises. The wine duty clauses will be dropped; the billiard-room keeper will stand exactly as he does now. The relief to hotels will not apply where the hotel keeper has in a separate part of his premises a public-house business. The composition for stamp duties on transfer for municipal stock we propose to fix at a lump sum of 12s. 6d., instead of 8d. per annum. I shall also have to move a Resolution in a separate Committee of the Whole House to raise the duty on public-houses according to a scale, at £5 per £100 rating, from £100 upwards, instead of stopping, as the Bill now does, at £100.

MR. CALLAN asked whether any alteration of duty had been made with respect to public-houses in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that would stand for consideration in Committee. They were only going into Committee pro formâ just now.

MR. STORER asked whether opportunities of discussing these questions would be given to Members who had Motions on the Paper?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 255]; re-committed for Thursday 15th July.

The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ARMY (HIGHER RANKS).

RESOLUTION.

MR. TREVELYAN, in rising to move—

"That steps should be taken to reduce the active list of generals to the point at which it is adequate, and no more than adequate, to the actual requirements of the Service of the country; that no appointment should henceforward be made to honorary colonelcies, due regard being had to the interest of existing officers:

said: Sir, there is this drawback about an exceptional case, that its possessor finds it hard to determine at which end to begin; and a stronger case than this, I venture to say, was never laid before the House of Commons. I have been long enough in this House to know that what it likes are facts; and facts it shall have—so clear, so strong, so plain and self-evident that, without comment or explanation, they constitute an argument in themselves. Englishmen—and small blame to them—are not accustomed to look abroad for instruction; but there is one country to which they are not ashamed to look for instruction with regard to Army matters, and that is Germany, or rather Prussia. We are never ashamed—it would be the height of folly if we were—to ask how Prussia treats any question relating to the maintenance of a National Army. The Prussian Army, in time of war, comprises 600,000 men present with the Colours. That Army is under the command of 150 generals. There are 13 generals in command of districts, 31 cavalry generals, 28 infantry generals of division, and 52 of brigade. 13 generals of artillery, and an average of 10 or 12 engaged in military administration. Every one of those generals is on the active list; and, as soon as he is unable to perform his duties, he leaves that list. To command the British Army of 400,000 men there are on The Army List 215 generals, 169 lieutenant generals, and 242 major generals, or 626 generals in all. That is to say, the list of generals, as shown on our Army List, for 400,000 men equals the active and retired list of the Prussian Army of 600,000 men; or, to put it in another way, our list of generals is more than four times as great as the Prussian list of generals who command the Prussian Army. Our retired list of generals is one which no man can number, and it is difficult enough to say how much our generals, active and retired, are paid; for the Estimates, framed more reasonably than they were 10 years ago, are not yet of a nature to assist the researches of an independent Member who is interested in military matters. But it stands something like this. Staff pay on the English Establishment, £19,000 a-year; honorary colonelcies, £203,500; salaries for administrative duties, say, £25,000; full-pay of general officers, £130,000; distinguished service money, £15,000; reduced and retired generals of Royal Artillery and Engineers, £47,000; half-pay to officers of the rank of general, say, £50,000; pay to general officers in India, £70,000; pay and pension, including colonels' allowances, to general officers of the Indian Service resident in England, taken approximately, at £240,000 a-year. These sums, added together, reach the enormous total of £784,500, or three and a-third times as much as that paid for commanding the greatly larger Army of Prussia. The larger part, but not much the larger, is borne by India; but I do not distinguish between what India and what England bears. We are here to protect the unrepresented millions of India. If we are not their protectors, if we do not see that their interests are not sacrificed to the private interests of individuals, there is no amount of exaction to which they will not be exposed. Well, that is the sum which, under the head of General Officers, the taxpayers of the British Empire are out of pocket yearly; and what is the value which they get for their money? Here I must ask hon. Members, who are not acquainted with the details of our military system, to prepare themselves for the incredible. Counting His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, we have 20 general officers employed in military commands at home. Engaged on administrative duties at home we have 14 general officers. Seventeen of our generals are actively employed in India, and 12 in the Colonies; so that, in all, 63 of our generals are actually at work at any given time—that is to say, while on an average every general in the Prussian Army, who is actually employed, costs his country £1,460 per annum; every general in the British Service, who is actually employed, costs the yearly sum of £12,444. The cause of this monstrous state of things is that, instead of a fixed list of generals, a list to which a man is promoted, not because he is to be called a general or to get the emoluments of a general, but because the country requires the services of a general, we have an immense, an amorphous, an unmanageable agglomeration of generals, old and young, effective and non-effective, men capable of discharging any military employment in the world, and men so notoriously incapable that no Minister in his senses would intrust them with the charge of a brigade. No less than 34 are not generals at all, but colonels and lieutenant colonels with temporary rank as brigadiers. The country ought to know that while, with the help of India, it is paying £750,000 to maintain a perfect army of generals, when there is duty to be done in India of the nature which falls to the lot of a general, proper men for the purpose are not to be found on this endless roll; but 34 officers of a lower grade have to be selected, and their pay raised, in order to fulfil the duties to which our list of generals, as at present constituted, is, by the confession of the Horse Guards and the War Office, unequal. And, no wonder; for instead of making the position of a general a business, and one of the most honourable businesses, we have turned it into a mere rank with no attributes except the name and the pay. When there are vacancies on the list of generals, instead of choosing the best man and the fittest man, we shovel in all the names that happen to stand at the top of the list of colonels. There may be here and there an exception; but that is our system. Are hon. Gentlemen aware what, in dealing with the appointment of general officers, a system of seniority means? In many callings age is no disadvantage. But it is not so with a general. Youth, or that excess of vital power and redundant health which, except in a few very fortunate people, advancing age too surely impairs, is a definite and indispensable qualification. Just think what the duties of a general are. To be awake when others are sleeping; to be about when others are stationary; to have at his fingers' ends the details of the transport, the commissariat, the exact local distribution of all the force under his command. And, with all this on his mind, to conduct the military operations; and, when the day's marching or fighting is over, to sit down and do another day's work at his desk. During his first and, perhaps, his most remarkable campaign, Pichegru relates that he himself only slept, on an average, one hour in the twenty-four; and, to come to our own successful general, I should just like to have a return of the number of hours a-day which Sir Garnet Wolseley spent in his saddle in South Africa, and on his legs in Canada and Ashantee. Let us look at our great wars, and at the age of the men who did so much for the glory of their country. The Duke of Wellington became a major general at 33; Lord Anglesea at 34; Lord Hill at 33; Lord Beresford at 39; Lord Combermere at 31; Lord Londonderry at 32. On the morning of Waterloo there was only one man in the British Army over 50; and that solitary individual was General Picton. That is the state of things that must exist in a fighting army, if it is to fight successfully. Let us see how it stands with us. In 1854, on the eve of the Crimean War, a Commission was appointed to inquire into the condition of the higher ranks of our Army. It was a most distinguished Commission, whose recommendations and observations were worthy of the closest attention; for it included the names of Lord Hardinge, Lord Raglan, Lord Seaton, Sir John Burgoyne, Sir Hew Ross, Sidney Herbert, Lord Dalhousie, and Lord Grey. The Commission reported that—

“The average age of existing major general is not less than 65, and that the lieutenant generals who will command divisions are, of course, older still.”

troops to commanders who were past their prime, and who, if they gained experience as commanders in one campaign, would be superannuated before they had time to make use of it in another; and then, as a remedy, they proposed to give commands to colonels and lieutenant colonels—that was to say, they could think of nothing better than to intrust the duties of a general to others than a general, because the generals whom we possessed were too old to exercise them. Now, that was a poor and weak remedy. It did not go to the root of the evil, and could be called very little better than a palliative; but that was the worst that could be said against it. It is left for a Government of our own day to invent a remedy that is a great deal worse than the disease. Things did not mend after 1854. In the year 1873, for instance, the four lowest officers on the list of major generals were aged respectively 53, 57, 55, and 51. The four lowest on the list of lieutenant generals were aged 73, 56, 73, and 82. The four lowest on the list of generals were aged 65, 72, 77, and 73. The evil is as great as ever; but the time has come when it can be mended. Purchase has been abolished, and a clear field has been made on which the new construction of our Army can be built. Where there has before been a vast and complicated multitude of vested interests, there is a tabula rasa, on which the authorities might make what sketch they choose, and might fill it up as they like. There never was such a chance for a bold and great Administration. And what was done? On Army questions I have never been and never will be a Party man; and, therefore, I cannot help saying that both the Liberal and Conservative Governments were to blame for what followed. The Liberal War Office, which had abolished Purchase, which ought to have had cut, dried, and ready, the organization by which it proposed to supersede the old abuses that had grown up under Purchase; which did not require a Bill, to be carried with difficulty through the two Houses, in order to effect what was wanted, but by a simple exercise of its volition and a few strokes of the pen, might have accomplished all that the nation had a right to demand. The Liberal War Office put off dealing with that question through the latter half of 1871, through the whole of 1872, through the whole of 1873, and left the work which they themselves were absolutely bound to complete, to be made or marred by their successors. And how did those successors fulfil the task? In 1877 Lord Cranbrook issued his Royal Warrant for Promotion and Retirement. What did Lord Cranbrook do? Did he reduce the enormous burden on the country, and provide us with young and effective generals by diminishing the list to the size that was wanted, and by promoting on to that list by selection? Nothing of the sort. He began by fixing the establishment of generals for the Guards and Line alone at 200, or quite thrice as many generals as are wanted for the service of our entire Army. Then he announced that that was to be an active list, and, consequently, that all general officers over 70 were to be retired; a process which reduced his list to about 200. And then, having fixed a list twice as large as the nation wanted; having reduced the number of generals to the size of that list; he then proceeded to create an enormous number of fresh generals, which eventually increased the list to a great deal more than half again the size which I have named, and announced that it would be the business of the War Office of the future to reduce the list to 200 by checking the rate of promotion for the next generation of officers. Was there ever such a device heard of before? It was foreseen by the Commission of 1854 that a compliant War Minister might some day be persuaded into such a course by the military men who surround him, and they have emphatically condemned it by anticipation, and warned the country against being ever infatuated enough to adopt it. But a Minister has been found to adopt it; and the consequence is that for the passing moment, indeed, we have some younger generals on the list. Here and there among men of 60 and 65, we find a man of 46, 47, and 48. But the advantage has been purchased by the certainty of a block in promotion, such as 10 or 15 years hence would make a major-general of an age for active service a thing to be stared at as a phenomenon; which would break the hearts and ruin the careers of all the ambitious and energetic colonels and officers in our Army. Before promotion returns to the same miserably slow rate of progress at which it crept along before the abolition of Purchase, the list of generals in the Guards and Line alone will have to be reduced by the slow, the cruelly slow, system of absorption of vacancies from 302 to 200. If we require 34 colonels on temporary rank to help our present comparatively young generals to do their duty, how many do you think we shall require when the full effect of Lord Cranbrook's scheme has had time to show itself? To fix the list of generals twice as large as is required, and then to swell that list more than half as much again by giving promotion to the officers of the present, at the expense of the officers of the future, is the most signal instance of subordination of private to public interests that has taken place in the time of any man living. Against that indefensible proceeding the Liberal Party protested, as a Party, in 1877; and I now call upon the Liberals, and upon as many Conservatives as put the interests of the Army before Party considerations, to condemn and to undo it now. To that Resolution which calls for an active list of generals, which should be an active list in fact, and not in name, I have, I believe, the assent of every every energetic and aspiring officer in the Army; and for that Resolution which calls for the abolition of the honorary colonelcies I claim the vote of every economist in the House. What is the real cause of the enormous cost of our Army, in its higher ranks, and what is the great difficulty of ascertaining and reducing that cost? It is that in the case of the Army we have lost sight of the great principle that always should govern the relations between the public and the servants of the public—the principle that those servants should be paid either in the shape of salary for the work that is still doing, or of pension for work that has been done. But these honorary colonelcies are neither salary nor pension. They are nothing more nor less than offices—old sinecure offices, which have descended from the bad old days of corruption and jobbery, and which, even in those bad old days, were distinguished by being especially obnoxious to a public sentiment which was then so little squeamish as to swallow almost anything. In the middle of the last century, people who were revolted at nothing else were revolted at the idea of the so-called leader of a battalion turning a few shillings by the clothing of every live soldier, and a few pounds by the clothing of every dead one; filling the muster-rolls with fictitious names, for which he drew pay, and making a small fortune when the regiment was decimated at a battle, where he was not present, or in an unwholesome climate where it was quartered, while he was comfortably seated over his whist-table in a London Club. And in the middle of this century, public opinion at last became too strong for the continuance of such an evil system. In 1854, Sydney Herbert gave the colonels a fixed allowance, in lieu of their old gains as contractors; but continued to them the responsibility of superintending the clothing of the regiment. But, in the next year, Lord Palmerston took away from them that responsibility, and turned the honorary colonelcies, for good and all, into pure, unadulterated, and unmitigated sinecures. They are not salaries, for the essence of a salary is that work shall be done for it; and, except attending, possibly, the regimental dinner, a colonel did no work, as colonel, from year's end to year's end. And, if possible, still less are they pensions. The characteristic of a pension is that it should be a fixed annual sum, proportioned to the salary and length of service of the person who receives it, beginning from the moment that he retires from service, never increasing in its amount, and, above all, never being enjoyed at the same time as salary. So strictly is this last condition observed in all other Departments, from the highest to the lowest, that when a Cabinet Minister, who has earned a pension, again takes Cabinet Office, his pension is withdrawn. But it is not so in the Army. The Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, while he draws £4,432 a-year as Commander-in-Chief, draws £2,200 a-year as colonel of the Grenadier Guards. The Military Secretary, while he draws £1,500 a-year as Military Secretary, draws 1,000 a-year as colonel of a regiment of the Line. The Adjutant General, while he draws £2,000 a-year as Adjutant General, draws £1,000 a-year as colonel of a regiment of the Line. One year and another, there are 20 high placed officers who enjoy these so-called pensions contemporaneously with, and in addition to, most ample salaries. I ask the House of Commons what it would think if it was proposed to introduce this precious system into any other Department of the Public Service? If our Judges of the High Court and our Lord Chancellors were to have, in addition to their salaries, honorary Recordships or Masterships rising from £1,000 a-year a-piece? If our admirals were to be gratified by having among them a hundred richly paid honorary post-captaincies, of which the snuggest and best were reserved for themselves by the high naval officials who distributed the rewards of the Service at Whitehall? The truth is that the whole thing is indefensible, and all War Ministers for a long time past have known it.

"I am not at all disposed," said Lord Cardwell, "to enter upon a defence of the system of honorary colonelcies."

Lord Hampton went further—

"I desire," he said, "to disclaim on my own part any defence of the system of honorary colonelcies; for I think that the system is not a good one, and might very easily be improved."

There never was but one tenable ground of defence for them, and that ground can be held no longer. There was a time when they were employed to compensate officers for the vast and frightful losses of money which they endured under the system of Purchase in the Army. In the year 1833 a Committee of the House of Commons sat to inquire into military sinecures, which, at that time, included the honorary Governorship of a great number of old unused castles, such as Berwick, Scarborough, Tynemouth, and Pendennis, but which, then as now, consisted mainly in the honorary colonelcies. The Duke of Wellington appeared as a witness to defend these sinecures, and to defend, at the same time, the enormous size of the list of generals. The ground of his defence was nothing more nor less than that officers must be compensated by sinecures for the money which they had sunk in buying their commissions.

"They have purchased," he said, "their commissions for large sums, and, being colonels of regiments, they cannot sell out; their money is sunk in the Service, and lost to them and their families for ever."

The officer sunk his money, and was half ruined, and the public had to maintain the expense of a great mass of

sinecures in order to ease the burden of those whom the Purchase system had stripped bare of their property. But now Purchase has gone—has gone long ago; and all this mass of honorary offices, and this great overgrown list of generals, ought long ago to have gone with it. Since the day when I first asked the House, more than nine years ago, to stop the appointments to honorary colonelcies, no less than three-fourths of the present generals have obtained their promotion to the list, and have taken their place among the claimants for these offices. When the day comes for them to be abolished, as it surely will, heavy and grave will be the responsibility of the Parliament which, by rejecting the Resolution which is now submitted to it, entails such an immense and needless additional burden upon the Exchequer. The prospects of lieutenant generals and major generals who look forward to colonelcies should be accurately reckoned, and made good to them in the shape of pensions, immediate or deferred; but the injustice, for it is nothing less, of a system under which officials at the Horse Guards being allowed to draw, in addition to their salaries, these great sums of money which they themselves defend, upon the ground that they are pensions for meritorious officers, should be put a stop to now, at once and for ever. The right hon. Gentleman at the War Office is the man to do this. He it was who, by a well considered and most successful scheme, depleted the over full ranks of admirals and post captains in the Navy with advantage alike to the officers who went and the officers who remained. Let the right hon. Gentleman ascertain how many officers are wanted for actual employment; how many generals to command at Gibraltar and Aldershot, in India and in Ireland; how many lieutenant generals are required to command divisions; how many major generals to command brigades; just as the Lord Chancellor ascertains how many Judges are required in each section of the High Court. Then, having ascertained what the duties are, and having allotted an officer of the proper rank to each, let him allot to each officer an adequate salary. I am not one of those who think that a working major general is overpaid on £700 a-year, and 12s.

a-day allowances. And let nobody thenceforward be made or called a general, unless a general is wanted to do general's duties; and then let the fittest man be taken. Now that we have no longer got Purchase we must have selection. There is no real difficulty about it. Before Purchase was abolished the Duke of Cambridge came before a Royal Commission, and announced that he, as responsible head of the Army, did not feel equal to selecting lieutenant colonels to command battalions. But Purchase was abolished, and His Royal Highness found himself quite competent to appoint lieutenant colonels. So, if Parliament insists upon it, he will find the selection of generals no impossible task. The truth is that when the duties to which a man is promoted are real duties promotion almost makes itself, and the best man is sure to be selected. Let the Government give the country the 100 generals for whom it has work, and restore to the name of general the prestige which will accrue to it when it is a reality instead of being, as it so often is, a sham; and you will do as much to educate the public spirit and maintain the efficiency of the Army as, in the end, you will do to save the pocket of the taxpayer. And, when generals are past work, let them retire on a fair and certain pension proportioned to their rank. Two or sometimes even three deserving officers might be pensioned for the sum that now is consumed in addition to a salary by one man or another who is not a retired officer at all; by reducing the Active List of generals to what the Service required; and by retiring superannuated generals on a fixed and well-ascertained scale of pension, you will save to the nation an annual sum the capital of which will more than cover half the capital which was expended, and, wisely expended, in abolishing Purchase. That course is one which, as Englishmen solicitous for the condition of the Army, and as Members of Parliament who are guardians of the public purse, we are equally bound to take, and in the confidence that many present will agree with me, I beg to move the first Resolution of which I have given Notice, and, subsequently, if that is carried, the second.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of his

introduced to the House and before the modifications, which were promised by the President of the Local Government Board in his opening speech, were made. No doubt, the original Bill created some exaggerated alarm; but the ground for this had been removed by the alterations. These alterations had all been indicated by his right hon. Friend in his opening speech, and, without affecting the main principle of the Bill, they were intended to define its application more clearly. The Government had limited the definition of the term "superintendent" until it came to be a person delegated with authority—a master or a person having others under his control, in contrast to persons employed in manual labour. The hon. and learned Member for Coventry (Sir Henry Jackson) had told them there was no principle in such a definition; but, for his part, he thought otherwise, as he felt confident there was a real distinction between persons in that position of authority, acting in lieu of the master, and for whom the master was expected to make himself almost personally liable, and in whose selection he must exercise particular care and attention, in contrast with the ordinary workman who could in no way exercise control. Then, they had made another modification, to which the hon. Member for Wigan had not alluded, which had a most important bearing on all the objections which had been urged against the Bill—they had limited the amount of liability. They had left no longer any room for extortionate demands; and what they had done was in the interest of the workman as well as of the employer. There was no longer any reason to expect any difficulty would arise from extortionate claims being made upon the employers. The alternative proposals made by the opponents of the Bill would, if accepted, impose much greater liability on the trade and industry of the country than was contemplated by the Bill itself as it now stood. Take, for instance, the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Coventry. He had urged that the law could not be left as it now was, and that he was willing to accept the principle of the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), if he was granted certain concessions. Now, what were those concessions which the hon. and learned

Member for Coventry said he was willing to adopt? The Bill which the hon. Member for Stafford introduced would make employers liable for acts of negligence of every workman in their employ. The hon. Member for Cardiganshire (Mr. D. Davies), for instance, had 4,000 workmen in his employ; and, therefore, if the Bill of the hon. Member for Stafford was introduced, the hon. Member for Cardiganshire would become liable for the acts of negligence of the whole of his 4,000 workmen, whereas the Bill before the House would only make the hon. Member liable for 50 out of the 4,000. The hon. and learned Member for Coventry asked that he should receive concessions limiting the compensation to £150, whereas the present proposal was three years' wages. The average wages of the county would not produce more than £200; and, therefore, all that the hon. and learned Member asked in return for raising the liability about 80 times was that damages should be reduced from £200 to £150. That was sufficient to show that hon. Members did not really understand the effect of the present Bill. Then, with respect to the alternative of "compulsory insurance," the hon. Member (Mr. Knowles) said he was willing to pay £1 for £1 paid by his workmen, and was willing that that should be not for accidents occasioned by negligence, but for all accidents to which workmen were liable. But he also said that the Bill did not deal with one-twentieth of those accidents. Thus, while he said the Bill was going to ruin all the mining industry of the Kingdom, he was willing to undertake a liability which could be proved authentically to be ten times greater than the liability which could be incurred under the Bill. Could those arguments be serious? Were they really presented with a view to acceptance by the House, or were they only put forward to delay the progress of the Bill? Of one thing he was certain. If their proposals were carried into effect, the persons whom they represented would say that the Government proposed to scourge with whips, but their Representatives proposed to scourge with scorpions. There was clearly an admitted grievance on the part of workmen, although the extent of that grievance was open to difference of opinion.

Among the grievances which existed there was another which had not been considered, and that grievance was that there was a positive immunity granted to large employers as compared with smaller employers. [Mr. MACDONALD: Hear, hear!] If the smaller employer extended his business, and substituted for his own personal inspection that of managers, the workmen were left without any compensation from the manager in case of an accident, and so the employer, at present, escaped all liability. Now, if it was admitted such a grievance existed, surely it was wise to attempt to remedy it, and it was almost dangerous to meet much a grievance with the answer non possumus. Agitation continued, the House was stormed, and hasty legislation was the consequence, which was much more injurious to the interests involved than it would have been if the matter had been taken up in time. There were now before the House three separate proposals. First, there was the proposal of the hon. Member for Stafford, and, as they had been urged to speak frankly on the matter, his right hon. Friend said, in the plainest possible terms, that the Government were unable to accept the principle of that Bill. He was not quite sure that there was not some ground for difference between a stranger and a workman. A stranger was entirely outside the operations; a workman was, to a certain extent, a partner in an enterprise, and to a certain extent he might be called upon to share the risk. On this ground, and on the ground that a principle which would involve so indefinite a liability would interfere with trade and enterprise, they had found themselves unable to accept it. The hon. Member for Stafford had not been over anxious to press his conclusion, and he had written a letter in which he had pointed out the nature and extent of the grievance of the workman, and had suggested that it should be met by making answerable for negligence not only the employer, but all those exercising a delegated authority. That modified view of the case was the one which they had endeavoured to meet by the Bill. The hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) would also abolish the distinction between the workman and the stranger, and he would do it, not by elevating the workman to the position of the stranger, but

by depressing the stranger to the position of the workman. He would lessen the existing liability of the employer, and would not extend it in the case of the workman. No one but the hon. Member had been bold enough to support his view. One effect of that would be that the Railway Companies would be relieved from liability in respect of accidents; and he did not think the public would travel in peace of mind if they knew that they were deprived of the security furnished by the fact that a Company would have to pay a heavy penalty for injury due to negligence. The third proposal was the Bill of the Government, and what it did was to lessen a practical grievance. It was not possible to obtain finality in this or any matter; but if the Bill were passed the case for interference would be very much weaker than it was at present. Now, what real objection could be urged against the Bill as it now stood? The most serious was that urged by the hon. Member for Wigan—that it would encourage litigation. To lessen the risk of that the Government entreated the assistance of the House; and if there were any way in which the liability to litigation could be reduced, the Government would be glad to accept it. But the general argument was an argument against all concession of legal right, for, if there were no law, there would be no litigation. They could not have a legal remedy without opening the way to litigation. Whether, in practice, the amount of litigation would be as serious as was supposed he was inclined to doubt. One or two questions might arise; but as many decisions would settle them once for all. The probability of litigation had been immensely lessened, if not altogether removed, by the proposal to limit the maximum amount of compensation. The largest sum a workman could receive would not generally exceed £200, and in a vast number of cases it would be much less. No doubt, the employer would make an effort to come to some agreement; and as a sum of from £20 to £50 would represent the difference between the claim and the offer, it was not likely that sensible people on either side would waste the money that should go into the pocket of one party or the other. Whether the Bill would do anything to expose us still further to foreign

hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan), and he hoped the same success which attended a portion of the Resolutions moved some years ago would follow that now before the House. What he alluded to was a set of Resolutions, one of which was for the abolition of Purchase, which had been rendered unnecessary by being taken up by the Government of the day, and which had been moved by his hon. Friend and seconded by himself. The reforms which the hon. Gentleman proposed to carry out, and the abuses which he had pointed out in the great age of our generals, and the great number of them, were matters which had been pointed out over and over again, and still remained unreformed; and he thought, considering the opportunity presented to the country so excellently by the abolition of the Purchase system, it was not creditable to Parliament that it had not occupied itself since that time in making the necessary reforms. But there was a great obstacle to all reforms in the Army; and he felt satisfied that, strong as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) was, he could not overcome the vis inertiae which prevailed at headquarters, which was at the Horse Guards under the old system, and was now at the War Office; while the Commander-in-Chief was not only a Royal, but a sort of life appointment. It was worse long ago, for not only was the Commander-in-Chief, but the Military Secretary as well, was a kind of permanent appointment. By agitation in the House they got rid of the Military Secretary, and got that office turned into a five years' appointment, and he was afraid there would be no genuine reforms in the Army until the Commandership-in-Chief was made a Staff appointment of the same five years' duration. He believed the Commander-in-Chief was a most excellent officer. He, no doubt, thoroughly understood the Army as, perhaps, no other man did; but he was prejudiced by belonging to the old school, and while he understood the Army he managed it in the old school way. He believed there would be no reform as long as the present system remained. There was another way in which that difficulty could be got over if the right hon. Gentleman would treat the Army government in another manner. There used to be a Lord High Admiral to manage the Navy; but that was so inconvenient that it was abolished, and the Navy was put under a Board of Admiralty. Why not abolish the Commander-in-Chief, who bore the very same relation to the Army which the Lord High Admiral did to the Navy, and let the Army be put under a Board similar to what the Navy was put under? He believed under such a system, with younger men, they would have reforms which, without it, they could never have. His hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs had so completely covered all the ground that he would not detain the House long, or stand in the way of those military Gentlemen who wished to take part in the discussion. He should, therefore, only say a few more words, and those would be on the honorary colonelcies. The hon. Member had stated that the cost of them was £203,000. He understood that in 1871 the figure was £162,500, and he was sorry to find that the amount had increased by some £40,000 since that date. He had hoped that the amount had decreased; because he had seen that, time after time, certain regiments had been given to Royal Dukes. Now, he would like some little explanation about that, and he had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman knew how that increase had taken place. They were informed by Lord Cardwell that when several regiments were given to Royal Dukes they were only paid for one of them. Thus the Prince of Wales was paid £1,350 for the 10th Hussars, and the Duke of Cambridge £2,200 for the Grenadier Guards, while they were told that the other regiments they held were purely honorary. He wanted to know if that remained the fact now, and if the other regiments since given to those distinguished personages were entirely honorary. He found the Prince of Wales had not only the 10th Hussars, but also the Rifle Brigade; and the Duke of Cambridge had not only the Grenadier Guards, but the 17th Lancers, the Royal Artillery, the Royal Engineers, and the 60th Rifles. He wished to know if the whole of them were honorary. He believed they were, and he hoped that was the fact; but, in recent discussions, he had seen it stated otherwise in print; and he thought the facts of the case ought to be made known to the country. If they were honorary, he, for his part, hoped that before long the Duke of Cambridge would get the whole of them. That seemed to him an easy way out of the difficulty. If the colonelcy of every regiment was given to the Prince of Wales or the Duke of Cambridge without pay, as an additional honour, as soon as it became vacant, they would in that way get rid of all that they complained of, and in a satisfactory manner. The hon. Member had spoken about there being no defence of the honorary coloncies by anyone; but he (Mr. Anderson) remembered very well that they had sometimes been defended by Lord Cranbrook—then Mr. Gathorne Hardy—who had stated that these positions were fair rewards for an honoured career, and that such prizes were given for long and high services. But if they were really so, it was rather a remarkable fact that so many of them went into the War Office or Horse Guards. In fact, they were entirely the result of a system of selection, and of a kind of selection that seemed to have become pure favouritism. That was one of the grounds on which he thought these appointments in the highest degree unsatisfactory; and he agreed with the hon. Member in thinking that the sooner the country got rid of them, and instituted some more satisfactory system, the better it would be for the Army. He had great pleasure in seconding the Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That steps should at once be taken to reduce the active list of generals to the point at which it is adequate, and no more than adequate, to the actual requirements of the service of the Country.”—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, he had listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), and had closely followed up all the facts and deductions that had been adduced; but he entirely failed to see that he had succeeded in establishing his case. The hon. Gentleman began by drawing a comparison between foreign Armies—especially that of Germany—and our own; but he (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) must at once say that such comparisons were really of little worth, unless a similarity between the two cases could be proved; and it should be borne in mind that we had large Colonial possessions to watch over, where officers had to be constantly sent to fill important appointments and carry out various duties in connection with those places. His hon. Friend went on to describe a state of things which, as a matter of fact, had entirely disappeared from our Service. He showed how, in former days, general officers who commanded regiments were men engaged in all sorts of business connected with the clothing and establishment of their respective corps; but his remarks on that head, though they might very well bear on the circumstances of 25 years ago, were in no way applicable, as hon. Members knew, to the present condition of affairs. At the present moment, the honorary colonels who had been denounced had nothing to do with the discipline or conduct of the regiments they commanded. What was their position? They were simply men in receipt of a pension for long and honourable past services in the Army, and nothing else. That was, in his opinion, the only defence which could be set up with regard to those colonelcies; and if they were abolished, what gain, he would ask, could be arrived at except an economic one? and he was unable, he confessed, to see how any such gain would arise. These general officers, who were borne on the Establishment of the Army, were receiving £450 a-year. Anyone looking at The Army List would find that they were borne on the non-effective side of the Estimates; and surely £450 a-year was no large pension for a man who had served, perhaps, 40 years in the Army. What, he would ask, was the position of an officer who had ceased to be in command of his regiment, his five years having expired? Reviewing his position, an officer so placed would find that if he retired he would receive as colonel £420 a-year, and the difference between that and £450 (the pay of a general officer) was only £30 a-year. Beyond that, it was, he thought, without doubt, very gratifying to such a man to be allowed to call himself general. If his hon. Friend desired, as he understood he did, to limit the number of appointments, and to lay down a rule that there should be only a certain number of general officers—as many as there were appointments to give away—the result of the adoption of his proposal would be to narrow the field of choice to such an extent that it would be impossible for the authorities to pick and choose the men they would wish to select. Now, in every business in life, if a man desired to be master of the situation, it was better, he maintained, to have half-a-dozen persons from whom to make a selection than to be limited to one; and, as matters now stood, the Secretary of State had the whole list of general officers from whom to pick. If an officer retired, he had to consider that £420 a-year was his retiring allowance; but he might say to himself that he would rather run the risk of going on and taking the chance of becoming a general officer. Before he could attain to that he would have to wait, perhaps four, five, or six years, and what pay did he receive during all that time? Two hundred a-year; while supposing that he had retired as a colonel on £420, there was a distinct gain to the State of the difference between those two sums. His hon. Friend, he might add, in the comparison which he drew between our own and foreign Armies, did not say a single word about the Militia, the Reserves, or the Volunteers, nor give the House any idea of what the establishment of general officers for that large number of about 450,000 men would be. His hon. Friend made a great point of the age of the generals who served in the old days. But those days had now gone by; and though the services of young officers were very desirable, it should not be forgotten that some of the most successful generals of our times were advanced in years. What did his hon. Friend say to Moltke, Blumenthal, and Sir Colin Campbell, who was already old at the time of the Crimean war, but who still was subsequently selected to command our Forces in the Mutiny? Why, his hon. Friend, by his system of excluding men at 65 or 70 years of age, would have prevented these eminent men from rendering service to their countries. In our existing system, against which the proposals of the hon. Member were levelled, there were, no doubt, blots; but he maintained that it had on the whole worked satisfactorily, and it should, therefore, continue to have his support.

SIR HARRY VERNEY thought the real question for the House to consider in connection with the subject under notice was whether the Army was overpaid. He was of opinion, upon that point, that no comparison could be made between our Army and that of any other nation, for the British Army did much more important and dangerous service, and received less pay, than any other Army in the world. Its circumstances were very different from those of the Armies of any other country, being liable to service abroad at any moment, whereas the Prussian Army resided in its own villages and in its own homes. For his part, he did not mind whether generals had pensions or regiments, but to bring the interests of the Service into account, he should prefer their having regiments, as the honorary colonels often did everything they could to benefit the regiments with which they were connected and to minister to their comfort. There was one great advantage in having a large number of general officers—namely, the advantage gained by having many men from whom to make selections. For general officers they wanted to be able to select young men, and he regretted that there were not more of them to choose from. No man could be more opposed than he to favouritism; and he was convinced that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) would not fail to introduce many of the reforms in the administration of the Army of which it stood in need.

MR. CHILDERS said, he was sure the House would permit him to congratulate his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) on the instructive statement with which he accompanied his Motion. No one would appreciate that statement more than himself (Mr. Childers), because he could not help remembering the time when his hon. Friend stood shoulder to shoulder and side by side with him (Mr. Childers) at the Admiralty, to fight a question very similar to this, in going through the details of the very great reforms found absolutely necessary for the administration of the Navy; and for which, however great might have been the differences of opinion at the time, both as to principle and details, he believed they might now claim that it had been entirely successful, and that not only the Service generally, but the prospects of officers, had been greatly improved. For that reason, on whatever points he and his hon. Friend agreed or did not agree, he begged to thank him for having brought forward so manfully a great scheme of reform in connection with the higher ranks of the Army. He felt sure

sinecures in order to ease the burden of those whom the Purchase system had stripped bare of their property. But now Purchase has gone—has gone long ago; and all this mass of honorary offices, and this great overgrown list of generals, ought long ago to have gone with it. Since the day when I first asked the House, more than nine years ago, to stop the appointments to honorary colonelcies, no less than three-fourths of the present generals have obtained their promotion to the list, and have taken their place among the claimants for these offices. When the day comes for them to be abolished, as it surely will, heavy and grave will be the responsibility of the Parliament which, by rejecting the Resolution which is now submitted to it, entails such an immense and needless additional burden upon the Exchequer. The prospects of lieutenant generals and major generals who look forward to colonelcies should be accurately reckoned, and made good to them in the shape of pensions, immediate or deferred; but the injustice, for it is nothing less, of a system under which officials at the Horse Guards being allowed to draw, in addition to their salaries, these great sums of money which they themselves defend, upon the ground that they are pensions for meritorious officers, should be put a stop to now, at once and for ever. The right hon. Gentleman at the War Office is the man to do this. He it was who, by a well considered and most successful scheme, depleted the over full ranks of admirals and post captains in the Navy with advantage alike to the officers who went and the officers who remained. Let the right hon. Gentleman ascertain how many officers are wanted for actual employment; how many generals to command at Gibraltar and Aldershot, in India and in Ireland; how many lieutenant generals are required to command divisions; how many major generals to command brigades; just as the Lord Chancellor ascertains how many Judges are required in each section of the High Court. Then, having ascertained what the duties are, and having allotted an officer of the proper rank to each, let him allot to each officer an adequate salary. I am not one of those who think that a working major general is overpaid on £700 a-year, and 12s.

a-day allowances. And let nobody thenceforward be made or called a general, unless a general is wanted to do general's duties; and then let the fittest man be taken. Now that we have no longer got Purchase we must have selection. There is no real difficulty about it. Before Purchase was abolished the Duke of Cambridge came before a Royal Commission, and announced that he, as responsible head of the Army, did not feel equal to selecting lieutenant colonels to command battalions. But Purchase was abolished, and His Royal Highness found himself quite competent to appoint lieutenant colonels. So, if Parliament insists upon it, he will find the selection of generals no impossible task. The truth is that when the duties to which a man is promoted are real duties promotion almost makes itself, and the best man is sure to be selected. Let the Government give the country the 100 generals for whom it has work, and restore to the name of general the prestige which will accrue to it when it is a reality instead of being, as it so often is, a sham; and you will do as much to educate the public spirit and maintain the efficiency of the Army as, in the end, you will do to save the pocket of the taxpayer. And, when generals are past work, let them retire on a fair and certain pension proportioned to their rank. Two or sometimes even three deserving officers might be pensioned for the sum that now is consumed in addition to a salary by one man or another who is not a retired officer at all; by reducing the Active List of generals to what the Service required; and by retiring superannuated generals on a fixed and well-ascertained scale of pension, you will save to the nation an annual sum the capital of which will more than cover half the capital which was expended, and, wisely expended, in abolishing Purchase. That course is one which, as Englishmen solicitous for the condition of the Army, and as Members of Parliament who are guardians of the public purse, we are equally bound to take, and in the confidence that many present will agree with me, I beg to move the first Resolution of which I have given Notice, and, subsequently, if that is carried, the second.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion of his

hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan), and he hoped the same success which attended a portion of the Resolutions moved some years ago would follow that now before the House. What he alluded to was a set of Resolutions, one of which was for the abolition of Purchase, which had been rendered unnecessary by being taken up by the Government of the day, and which had been moved by his hon. Colonel Loyd Lindsay that the debate, whatever their individual opinions or the intentions of the Government might be, could not but be beneficial and helpful to those who, sooner or later, would have to deal with the question. His hon. Friend would, perhaps, allow him to say that it would, however, be rather hard upon those who were now responsible for the administration of the Army, if it were held that on the spur of the moment, when the Government had not been two months in Office, it was their duty to take steps for greatly reducing the list of generals, or to put an end altogether to the appointment of honorary colonels, and commence from the present month a totally different system from that now in existence. That would not be a reasonable proposition. What he should, in reply, endeavour to do was to show in what respect he felt himself bound to agree with his hon. Friend in the principles which he had laid down, and in what respects his views were open to considerable question. He should then indicate what course the Government had intended to follow, irrespective of the Motion his hon. Friend had brought forward, and he would appeal to his hon. Friend to say whether or not he considered the Government were pursuing the right path. He must ask the indulgence of the House, considering the enormous mass of complicated questions which he and his advisers found unsettled when they took Office, if it should be thought that they were not proceeding so rapidly as could be wished. There might be some appearance of slowness; but he might speak for himself, and he thought also for his Colleagues, that when they had once made up their minds they would not hesitate to carry their plans into effect. But it must not be forgotten that those who had held responsible positions like the charge of the great Services had to balance considerations of a very delicate character; and in the case before the House there were especial considerations to be borne in mind, as affecting both the feelings and claims of those who devoted their lives to their country. The Government felt it incumbent on them to proceed with caution and deliberation. He thought his hon. Friend had failed to realize some of the essential facts of his case. He had referred to the perfect organization of the German Army. That organization had involved enormous labour on the part of its authors, and there was much for us to learn from it. But, at the same time, he must remind his hon. Friend that the conditions of the Service were totally different from those which existed in the English Army. Germany had no India and no Colonies; her Armies could never have occasion to go more than 500 or 1,000 miles from her frontier. She was, essentially, a compact Power, both in respect of her internal and external requirements. The requirements of the English Administration extended from pole to pole and all round the world; probably over a greater distance than had ever been subject to any Power, unless it were Spain under Charles V. and Philip II. That was a valid reason why the German Army could not be taken in all respects as a model for us, and why it was by no means easy to adopt the proposition of his hon. Friend to follow her in fixing the number of generals. But he must say he did not understand where his hon. Friend got his figures from. He could not accept their accuracy. His hon. Friend had given the number of general officers on the Active List as 600; but that was not correct. He (Mr. Childers) had before him statements of the actual number of British general officers, whether in connection with the Army proper, or the Indian Staff Corps, and under no possible arrangement could he see there were 600 Generals on the Active List of the Army. The number was very considerably less than that. Perhaps the House would allow him to state what the present arrangements of the Army were as to the numbers of general officers, and the nature of the emoluments, whether they were called pay, pension, or salary. Now, the state of things appeared to be these. There was a List which was called the Establishment of General Officers. That consisted of a body of 292 general officers of Cavalry and Infantry in England, and 50 general officers of Artillery and Engineers; but it was contemplated by the Warrant of 1877 to reduce the number 292 to 200. The Artillery and Engineers were intended to be left as at present. That was, strictly speaking, what might be called the Active List of general officers, and it was supplemented by the Retired List of general officers under the Warrant of 1877. He must admit that he thought it was in many respects a curious anomaly that the general officers on the Active List and the body of retired general officers under the Warrant of 1877 received precisely the same emoluments. In either case it was £450 a-year, and in either case the general might receive at some future time £1,000 a-year in the shape of some honorary colonelcy. But there was no question but that this was a very remarkable anomaly; and he was bound to say that, in his opinion, it was quite indefensible in principle. His hon. Friend who moved the Resolution had clearly defined what a pension ought to be, and none of the conditions of a pension were to be found in the case with which he was dealing. In fact, all the arrangements in this respect were curious and anomalous, and, in his opinion, had nothing to justify them but their antiquity. He would also admit that the arrangement for the pay of general officers seemed to him almost as anomalous. A colonel, when he reached that position, had the option of either taking a pension of £420 a-year, with the ordinary rank of general, or remaining in the Service on pay at the rate of £200 a-year, hoping some day to succeed to the establishment of general officer. When he attained the establishment he received a rate of pay which never altered, whether he became a lieutenant general or a full general; but waited on in the hope that a vacancy on the list of honorary colonelcies would provide him with £1,000 a-year. It was quite true that in awarding honorary colonelcies he believed the Army universally felt that the Commander-in-Chief very wisely exercised his discretion, and with great fairness. But both as to progressive pay, and as to the system of pension, he was bound to admit that, in his humble judgment, the view expressed by his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) was precisely the view on which the great reform was introduced at the Admiralty which had worked so well; and it was a view which they ought to take into consideration in any arrangement affecting the superior officers of the Army. He would go a little further. With respect to what his hon. Friend had said in reference to the size of the list, it was, no doubt, the case that the late Government followed generally the advice of the Royal Commission; but, in one respect, the Government went very much beyond the Report. There was to be a considerable reduction in the list of general officers; but, instead of taking full advantage of the large retirement for age, the Government had filled up the vacancies, creating an enormous promotion in 1877, and left to their successors the disagreeable task of gradual reduction. Whether that was a wise arrangement or not was not for him (Mr. Childers) to say—it was a matter which had passed, and could not be re-considered now. The Report of the Royal Commission made mention of honorary colonelcies, not defending them in principle, but stating that the system was not unpopular; and they also pointed out that disqualifications which might apply to active service would not apply in time of peace, and that it would be erroneous to regard the Establishment as if it were only composed of officers who were intended for active service. He had always regarded that Report as having added very greatly to their knowledge, and guided them satisfactorily to many changes which had to follow the abolition of Purchase; but he was bound to admit that, in his opinion, the Commission did not give sufficient time to the consideration of the proper position of the Establishment of general officers. He would not blame the War Office, because the changes which were recommended and effected by the Commission were so vast and the difficulty so great; but the full deliberation which it deserved had not yet been given to the important question of the proper construction of the Active List of generals. He did not think, for instance, that it was in consonance with what they had found to be advantageous of late years that the Active List should consist of persons admittedly not fit for active service. He would sum up with three or four suggestions. He thought it was well worthy of consideration whether it would not be advantageous to the Public Service to carry the change effected in 1877 by the construction of the Retired List a good deal further, so that the Active List should more nearly represent the numbers of officers really competent for active service, and should bear a nearer relation to such number as might be required, not only in time of peace, but also in time of war. In that respect, they ought to take time and care to see how far they could move in that direction; and also, they should, as soon as possible, and with a due regard to vested interests—which the hon. Gentleman himself was anxious to respect—see whether it would not be possible to abandon the anomalous system which made the emoluments of officers on the Retired List the same as those of the Active List, and which left open to the one as to the other that enormous jump from £450 to £1,000, the latter sum being one many officers for a long time on the Active List or on the Retired List never attained. His hon. Friend had referred to the arrangements that had been made in the Navy. He (Mr. Childers) did not say that those arrangements ought to be literally copied. But they must remember that the depletion of the Active List of the Navy was effected not only by the limit of age, but by that most important condition which it was, in the first instance, somewhat difficult to carry out—namely, that officers should, after a certain period of non-service, be compelled to retire. That was the most effective weapon for keeping the Service in an healthy condition. The half-pay of a rear admiral was the same as that of a major general on the Establishment—about £450 a-year; but the pay of a vice admiral was nearly £600 a-year, and the pay of an admiral was something over £750 a-year, while the lieutenant generals' and generals' remained a constant quantity. So, also, the retired pay of a rear admiral averaged £600 a-year, that of a vice admiral £750 a-year, and that of an admiral £900 a-year. He hoped the House would encourage and assist the Government, if they should find it practicable, to apply a similar system to the Army—a system which would, in time, get rid of the colonels of regiments, except as honorary officers connected as such with the regiments to which they had belonged, and would be so adjusted as not to disappoint the legitimate expectations of those who were on the major generals' list. Of one thing he was perfectly certain. The Royal Commission of 1876 said that the only justification of the present arrangements in the Army was to be found in the fact that they were not unpopular; and he was certain that if they adapted to the Army the system in the Navy to which he had adverted, it would not be unpopular, provided that great pains were taken to respect vested interests. In that case, he felt sure that such a reform as he had indicated would be beneficial to the Service. He, therefore, hoped that the House would accept the statement he had now made as an earnest of a genuine intention on the part of the Government to do what they could to put the future arrangements as to the appointment, the promotion, the number, and the retirement of general officers of the Army on a satisfactory footing. His hon. Friend knew as well as he (Mr. Childers) what were the difficulties which they had to go through at the Admiralty, and the complexity of the details of the settlement there. All this would have to be gone through in regard to the Army; and he trusted that his hon. Friend would admit that his statement showed their earnest desire to grapple that subject, and to proceed with it in the direction which had been approved by Parliament in the case of the sister Service. If his hon. Friend, and those who thought with him, would leave to the Government the task of seeing with what details and conditions such a change as that should be effected, he would probably not deem it necessary to pledge the House in the words of his Resolution to an immediate alteration, which it would be impossible to carry out without very considerable difficulties, and also without injury to the Service, but which, if accomplished with discretion and after due inquiry, would, he believed, be acceptable alike to the House, to the Army, and to the country.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he understood that his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had advocated a scheme of reform that deserved considerable attention; but he (Lord Eustace Cecil) must admit, from his own official experience, that there was much to be said in favour of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Childers) refraining from taking the subject in hand at once, because there were a great many questions connected with the Army still pending, and likely to be pending for several years; and it was hardly fair, therefore, to expect that the right hon. Gentleman should have already made himself master of all those questions, and should have been able during the short time he had held his present Office to give the House a complete idea of any scheme of reform which he might hereafter propose. He (Lord Eustace Cecil) understood that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs had drawn a comparison between our Army and foreign Armies; but in looking at the list of generals in foreign Armies, he thought that that hon. Member had only obtained the list of those who were actively employed. When, however, they compared the number of generals in our Army with the number in foreign Armies, it should be remembered that, whether the system was bad or good, tradition had long established the custom of amalgamating the generals of all branches of our Army together; and it was only since the War-rant of 1877 that what was called a Retired List had been placed in The Army List, so that those generals who were ineffective from age were put aside by themselves. He admitted that a re-arrangement of the list would be desirable; but that was, after all, a matter of detail. As to the number of generals, his right hon. Friend said, and said truly, that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs did not state the number correctly. The list of generals, said the hon. Member, was as many as 600. In 1878 the number, no doubt, was 632; but he (Lord Eustace Cecil) looked into The Army List for June, 1880, and found that the number had dropped down to 476. As to the question of economy, the hon. Member for the Border Burghs thought that by some arrangements he might save certain portions of that rather miserable sum—something like £300,000 a-year—that they paid to general officers. When they compared the pay of general officers with the emoluments of the Law, the Church, or several other Professions, he thought that £400 or £600, or it might be £1,000 a-year for an honorary colonelcy was not, after all, too much to be received by a man who had been in the Service 30 or 40 years, and who, perhaps, had been wounded in the service of his country. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs might wish to abolish honorary colonelcies; but he did not believe that the hon. Member wished to abolish pensions. He believed the hon. Member wished to see an Active List—that there should not be anything further than a re-arrangement of the present system. The question as to certain allowances which were received by illustrious and distinguished personages who had to deal with our Army was a very delicate one. Whether the actual sum they received was too much for the work they did he must leave to Ministers of the Crown to decide. He thought there should have been a little more consideration on the part of hon. Members who looked with a certain amount of jealousy upon some honorary colonelcies held by illustrious Princes in this country; but he thought that those hon. Members ought to inquire into the facts, and consider them more carefully, before they referred so publicly and invidiously to the offices and emoluments of these illustrious personages. If it could be shown that the pay and pensions which the latter received were more than the duties they discharged entitled them to, they, he was sure, would be the first to offer to resign these emoluments. He could only repeat that whenever the right hon. Gentleman brought forward his promised reforms they would be considered on that side of the House without prejudice; and he hoped they would be just and characterized by a spirit of fairness.

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he should not trouble the House with many remarks on the criticisms which his views had undergone. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Office (Mr. Childers) had spoken with courtesy, and he thought also with wisdom and thorough knowledge of the Department over which he presided, in what he had said; but he (Mr. Trevelyan) could not concur in the remark he made to the effect that the Resolution was somewhat premature. So far as the right hon. Gentleman was concerned, it certainly was not. It was 10 years ago that Purchase was abolished, so that there was little ground for alleging the Resolution to be premature; and he did not think it was premature as regarded the public feeling on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman had called in question some of his (Mr. Trevelyan's) figures; but there could be no doubt that England and India, one year with another, were now spending £750,000 annually on their generals, and only 63 were employed, so that each really cost the country £12,000 or £12,500 a-year. The answer of his right hon. Friend was satisfactory to his mind. He gathered from it that the honorary colonelcies were going. That was the necessary corollary from the re-arrangements which they were told were to take place between pay and pensions. What he was still more interested in, however, was this—that henceforth the rank of general should imply that certain duties were to be discharged by the officer who held it, and that he should be taken by seniority, and not by selection. That was enough for him. And as to promotion by selection, not by seniority, he took leave to draw the inference that when the list of generals was only adequate to the performance of the duties of generals, the officers on that list would be promoted by selection. After the speech of the right hon. Gentleman and the feeling which the House had manifested, he felt he should not be justified in asking for a division, and he left the subject with the most perfect confidence in the hands of the Government.

GENERAL BURNABY said, he would say, with reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), that the Commander-in-Chief had most important duties to discharge, and it would be most unfortunate if his tenure of office was limited to the term of five years. The Duke of Cambridge, abstracting himself from all other avocations, had devoted himself to the welfare of the Army. So far from being prejudiced, he was opposed to change for the mere sake of change, it was true, but there was no man who was a stronger advocate for all those rational and well-considered measures which the lapse of years and altered circumstances had necessitated. He was an officer endeared to the Army and trusted by the nation, and it would be extremely unwise to limit the tenure of his office as proposed. The hon. Member who brought forward the Motion (Mr. Trevelyan), he might add, had left entirely out of account the Militia and Volunteers, who, with the Regular Army, constituted a body of something like 500,000 men ready at any moment, to say nothing of another 500,000 who had passed through the ranks, many of whom, no doubt, could be raised, and who would require to be officered.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MAINTENANCE OF MAIN ROADS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. R. H. PAGET, in rising to call the attention of the House to the expense of maintaining Main Roads, and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is not just that the cost of the maintenance of Main Roads should be wholly and entirely borne by the Local Rates,” said, that a Petition on the subject, very numerous signed, had been presented from the county of Somerset, in which it was alleged that, owing to the abolition of turnpikes, a grievous burden had been thrown on the agricultural interest for the purpose of keeping the roads in repair; and he hoped the Government would not lightly set aside the claims of Petitioners to be heard because those claims were urged with moderation.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. R. H. PAGET resumed. He held in his hand a Return which showed that there were 10,000 miles of main roads, which were maintained at an expense of £300,000—an average of £31 per mile—while the mileage of roads not main roads was 57,000, and the average cost per mile £14. The main roads were intended for the benefit of the community, and without them the ordinary commercial enterprizes of the country could not be carried on. The burden of maintaining them, however, fell solely upon the ratepayers, who justly held that they were aggrieved. When the turnpike system was in vogue the burden of maintenance was borne by the public at large; but, by the abolition of the system, the burden, to the extent of £500,000 a-year, was transferred to the shoulders of the ratepayers—in other words, partly on the owner and partly on the occupier. That, he contended, was unjust and unreasonable. The question was, Who was to pay for the maintenance of the highways? It would be said that the proper persons to pay were the landlords. That was one of the stock arguments which were always being brought forward. But it was an argument which ought at once to be thrown aside. The Amendment which had been brought forward was no Amendment at all. It was said that the cost of maintaining the roads ought to be borne by the occupiers. But that position was entirely untenable. Then it was said that there ought to be a division of the rates. But he felt sure that no relief would be obtained in that way. He thought that no satisfactory settlement would be reached until they reverted to the principles which were adopted in earlier days, when all who used the roads were made to pay for their maintenance and repair. Those principles were laid down in a well-known Statute, the 43rd Elizabeth, which provided that the liability to pay should be in proportion to the ability to pay. Everybody had to supply labour for the maintenance of the roads with horses and carts, and, if he had no horses or carts, with personal labour. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were much interested in the Land Question, and were, many of them, anxious to create a peasant proprietary; but, in the present state of things, the burdens on land were so great that nobody would be anxious to take them upon his shoulders. He wanted to draw attention to one fact—the progress of personalty and realty. They were both progressing year by year; but while realty—land and houses—was making steady advances, personalty was advancing by leaps and bounds. Now, what he maintained was this—that, in view of the these facts, every Chancellor of the Exchequer should carefully consider the adjustment of taxation, and should maintain it without considering how it affected these two classes of property. Under the auspices of the late Government advances were made in aid of local taxation; but the new charges had absorbed the whole of the recent subventions. He pointed out these evils; it was no part of his business to find a remedy; but there were more ways than one of meeting the evil. One was the method of subvention out of Imperial funds, with which they were all familiar. Then there was the Bill which had been laid on the Table for the establishment of a horse tax, in order to create a fund in aid of the roads. It had also been suggested that the assessed taxes should be thus employed. It had further been suggested—a suggestion which he was inclined to think the most feasible—that the dog tax should be handed over to the local authorities in aid of the maintenance of roads. A few years ago the Commissioners of Inland Revenue recommended—what was now practically carried out—that the dog tax should be collected by the county police. Moreover, in Ireland, the dog tax was handed over to the local authorities, and that was a precedent entirely in point. The amount of the dog tax received in 1878 was £371,000, and a Return made up to Lady Day in the next year brought it up to £422,000. The allocation of a tax which might be collected in the country and applied to country uses, as was done in Ireland, would be a fit mode of meeting a just and reasonable claim. The Highway Act had had the effect of introducing a classification of roads, and if the State singled out the main roads as entitled to such a contribution for their maintenance they would be found ready to its hand. In conclusion, he might say that the grievances of the English farmers were not urged with the vehemence with which those of their brethren in the sister Island were often put forward; but they ought not on that account to receive less consideration from the House, for there was no question to which attention was so much turned in the rural districts as the one included in his present Motion. This question should not be pooh-poohed. The farmers of the country asked, not for favour, but for justice. They would be found among the most loyal of the people. “These burdens,” they said, “are new; they were imposed at a time when we were afflicted, and we have a right to ask that these things should be carefully considered.” This was no imaginary grievance. The demand was moderate, and he had urged it temperately. He begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is not just that the cost of maintenance of Main Roads should be wholly and entirely borne by the Local Rates.”—(Mr. Richard Paget.)

MR. J. R. YORKE said, this question was, as his hon. Friend (Mr. R. H. Paget) had stated, one of great and ever pressing importance. Most county Members on that side of the House, who had to attend Vestry and other meetings of their constituents, in the course of the Recess, must have remarked what very great importance appeared to be attached to the subject in the minds of their rural constituents. He could only say, for himself, that whereas foreign affairs were in a troubled condition, and Members of Parliament sometimes addressed harangues, treating of Eastern and other foreign questions to their constituents, their remarks on those subjects fell comparatively flat on the ears of the audience, compared with the avidity with which they listened to any allusions to agricultural questions, and more especially when they treated of the highway grievance. That, he thought, was the experience of almost all of them; and they felt very strongly that the Session ought not to pass by without a new Parliament and a new Government having their attention directed as forcibly as possible to the pressing importance of this question. His hon. Friend had narrated, with great accuracy, the history of the question. There was no doubt that turnpikes, for some time past, had been felt to be a doomed institution. Whatever their merits, and, as his hon. Friend very properly said, they were constituted on the principle that those who used roads should pay for them, and that they should pay for them just in proportion to the amount in which they used them, still they were, to a certain extent, an anachronism, dating back to the time when road traffic was much more important, before the introduction of railways, and when the relative cost of collection was nothing like so great as at present. When the cost of collection, in some cases, amounted to something like 30 per cent on the total receipts, it became evident that an institution such as that of turnpikes could no longer be reckoned among the permanent institutions of the country. Well, the way in which this matter first came before the public was in consequence of the injustice and the hardships of the piecemeal disturnpiking of roads. Every year most of the country Members had applications made to them, from districts scheduled, for disturnpiking by the Turnpike Committee, and every year some victims were selected for a termination of their precarious existence. The Turnpike Committee in 1877 made a Report, which showed the embarrassment which they experienced in dealing with those matters. They said the circumstances of the several trusts varied so much that it was impossible to apply any one rule. In some districts the turnpike road formed a thoroughfare between two populous towns, and almost assumed the character of a street, large sums being paid out of the tolls for lighting and watering. They continued—

“In such cases, and where no agricultural district intervened, your Committee had no difficulty in recommending that the Trust should be discontinued. But no greater cases of prospective hardship in parishes came before your Committee than where a line of road, with a very heavy mineral traffic, between two towns, or to and from a railway station, passed for a considerable distance through agricultural parishes.”

And the next sentence was important, because they said—

“Whatever may be the provision for other parts of the country, it seems to your Committee that some general provision will have to be made to meet the cases.”

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Collins, Colonel Colthurst, Mr. William Corbet, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Blennerhassett.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COLLINS, in rising to move that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he proposed to justify the measure by showing, as he hoped to the satisfaction of the House and the Government, that it was a subject that was entitled to attention and sympathy, not only because it seriously affected the welfare of a numerous class of persons in Ireland, but because it had considerable national importance, probably to a greater extent than a superficial view of the subject would seem to indicate. The main feature of the proposal was the establishment and organization of a Board of unpaid Commissioners in Ireland, who would be willing to give their time and attention to the subject in the hope of reviving the industry. It was true there was a body of Fishery Inspectors, who, for zeal and intelligence, and for their desire to promote the objects that they had been appointed to take care of, had few equals in any Department of the State; and the people of Ireland and those who took an interest in the subject were grateful to them for the able Reports which they had published since their constitution in 1869. They did not propose to interfere with the operations of that body; but the fact was that their powers were so limited, and the means at their disposal so inconsiderable, that, practically, they were able to effect no good beyond the good of restraining abuses and of circulating the able Reports to which he had made reference. The first feature of the measure was the establishment of a Board or a body of unpaid Commissioners. He did not wish to stipulate the number, and only desired that the principle might be adopted. Such a Board as the one they desired had already been in existence in Scotland for a considerable time past; and it would, no doubt, be interesting to the House to hear what was reported by the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the operation of that Board. The unpaid Scotch Board consisted of 20 unpaid Commissioners and one paid Secretary. The Commissioners report—

“That the members of the Board have rendered important service in assisting for a long period of years in the development of this branch of national industry, and it is impossible to doubt the social and moral advantages which may and do result to this class of people—namely, the fishery class—from the attention bestowed upon their welfare by the body of eminent persons, distinguished by their rank, position, and knowledge, who are constantly endeavouring to obtain and disseminate information useful to those employed in the fisheries, to encourage their enterprise, to stimulate their industry, and to promote their physical and moral welfare.”

That was the kind of Board they sought to establish in Ireland. In 1819, an Act was passed appointing a Board for the management of the Fisheries in Ireland, and investing its members with considerable powers. This Board consisted of 20 unpaid Commissioners, one Secretary, three clerks, four Inspectors general, and 20 local Inspectors. Mr. W. Andrews, in a very interesting Paper on the subject of the Herring Fisheries in Ireland, which he read before the Royal Dublin Society, 1866, said—

“It is singular to remark the effect of these laws on the Irish Coast. In 1819 there were only 27 vessels and 188 men returned as employed in the Irish Fisheries; in 1823 there were 27,143 vessels and boats, employing 44,448 men.”

The Board continued in existence 11 years; and in the last Report issued in 1830, Mr. Barry, the Inspecting Commissioner of Irish Fisheries, who was well known to all who took an interest in Irish fishery matters, reported that the period of the operations of the Board was a period of unexampled industry and prosperity for the Irish Fisheries. After 11 years of its action there were 12,611 vessels employed in the Fisheries, and 64,771 men and boys. It was only right to state, however, that the success of the Fisheries during that period was not to be strictly attributed to the fact of having an unpaid Board of Commissioners, for a powerful stimulus was given to the industry in the shape of a bounty on the take of fish. Nevertheless, he was warranted in attributing a certain amount of the success to the services of the Commissioners, and he would take the benefit of the circumstance with this qualification. Next, after making provision for the constitution of a Board of Commissioners and the appointment of officers, the present Bill proposed to hand over to the Commissioners the inconsiderable but useful fund called the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund. With regard to that fund, which had been vested with the Commissioners of Public Works to be expended on the recommendation of the Irish Fishery Commissioners, he wished to say that when the then Chief Secretary for Ireland handed it over to be applied to the promotion of Irish Fisheries, he stated that it was merely a tentative proposal, and that, no doubt, it would lead to further and greater results. The Bill proposed to supplement the fund by the very modest sum of £30,000. He should prefer that the amount was £100,000 at least. In the four years during which the fund had been administered from 1874 to the date of the last Report issued by the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, he found that altogether, owing to the restricted character of the regulations applying to this loan, only 1,078 loans were issued, amounting to £19,352, or an average of about £18 per loan, and there was available during the last year for the purposes of advances the small sum of only £6,741, for which there were 945 applicants. Now, he asked them to supplement that fund by £30,000, leaving it to the generosity and sense of justice of the right hon. Gentleman to increase the amount very considerably of his own motion. The increase he (Mr. Collins) proposed would admit of about 2,000 annual loans on the same computation as the existing fund. The next proposal of the Bill he looked upon as one of the most important—namely, the transference to the Commissioners to be constituted by this Bill of the care and custody of the fishery piers and harbours now vested in the Commissioners of Public Works (Ireland). He asked, moreover, that the inconsiderable sum of £20,000 a-year be intrusted to the new Board in aid of the erection, improvement, and enlargement of fishery piers, either by way of grant or loan. Without some such provision for the construction and maintenance of fishery piers, no permanent improvement could be made in Irish fishery enterprise. He was glad to see that the Government were directing their attention to this important subject, and had already proposed to grant £45,000, which would be only a commencement in the direction he indicated. It was possible that some opposition might be offered to some of the money proposals of the Bill, as being opposed to certain economic principles with which some persons might delude themselves by misrepresenting facts, and justifying such misrepresentation on some theory of political economy. But if he could succeed in overcoming such opposition by his statements, he would have some hope that good would result, which might in time develop itself into something much better than the limited measure which he now brought forward. He asked the Government to appropriate from the Imperial Exchequer a sum of money to be applied by way of advances in loans to persons engaged in fishing industries in Ireland. The sea coast of Ireland was computed to reach 2,500 miles in length, measuring bays and inlets. It embraced throughout its length numerous excellent harbours, some of them being capacious and well-sheltered, but grievously neglected. The people along this great range of sea coast were inured from their childhood to hardy habits of life which only vicinity to the sea could teach; and all were willing, men and women, to work if aid were afforded them to utilize their labour. The question might be asked—“What have the people themselves done to profit by such resources, and to improve their own condition?” The answer was simple and the explanation easy. In 1846 there were 113,000 men and boys engaged on the fisheries. The great Famine of the following year swept away the greater part of these poor and industrious people; and the result was that the Fisheries had gone on decreasing until, according to the last Report of the Fishery Commissioners, the number of boats engaged had been reduced from 20,000 to 5,700, and the number of men and boys from 113,000 to something like 20,000—that was to say, the active and industrious fishery population of Ireland had been greatly reduced by disasters over which they had no control. To Irishmen that was a most terrible and regrettable state of things. They found this great national industry, so appropriate to the country, dying away. There might be theories as to the causes of this; but they did not recognize those theories. They looked at the fact, and grieved over it. Among other books that had lately come under his notice was a little work published in 1868 by the hon. Member for Waterford County (Mr. Blake), who was second to none in the interest he had taken in the subject. In that little book, called The Sea Fisheries of Ireland, and addressed to the then Chief Secretary, the hon. Member remarked—

“By those who thoroughly understand the subject, it is anticipated that the assertion will not be deemed too bold that if the immediate cultivators of the Irish soil—and 988,927, or 18 per cent of the population, according to the Census of 1861, were returned as agricultural—were deprived of it as a means of support, they might in time, under intelligent direction, derive as good a livelihood from the river shores and surrounding seas of Ireland.”

This showed the vast importance of the subject, and the benefits to be derived from attention to it. The yearly value of the fish exported from Ireland amounted to about £500,000; but they had the authority of the intelligent Inspectors of Fisheries for believing that that sum could be very considerably increased—in fact, they had stated that it could be increased ten-fold. That might be an exaggerated estimate; but, at all events, it could be very largely increased if fishermen could procure the necessary appliances with the aid of moderate loans. In 1870, the first year after his hon. Friend (Mr. Blake) had applied his energy and talents to the subject, the Commissioners said in their Report that—

“No improvement can be looked for in the sea fisheries until loans are advanced to a portion of the fishermen for the repair and purchase of boats and gear.”

On such a statement, coming from such authority, any comment of his would be superfluous. They had it also on authority that £7,000,000 was paid annually for fish in London alone, and an equal amount in the Provinces, making the quantity consumed in England yearly worth £14,000,000. If they could increase the supply from Ireland, not to 10 times its present amount, as estimated by the Commissioners, but to six times, or £3,000,000, what a benefit it would be to the working classes by reducing the price and giving them an additional supply of a cheap and wholesome food, which at present costs double as much as it did 20 years ago! But there was another argument in favour of giving Imperial aid to promote Irish Fisheries. It was well known that great difficulty existed in providing a sufficient number of effective men and boys to navigate the merchant ships of the United Kingdom. We had about 200,000 men and boys, exclusive of captains and superior officers, employed in our merchant ships, and the utmost efforts were required to keep up a really efficient supply. Might he not point to the decline of the Irish Fisheries as one of the causes which increased the difficulty of finding good seamen? Twenty-three years ago, there were 113,073 seafaring men and boys engaged in those fisheries; to-day, there was only about one-sixth of the number, or 20,307. It was natural to suppose that a large percentage of the men and boys employed in the Fisheries would be annually available for our merchant ships. He had known some of the first captains navigating the seas to have been humble Kinsale fisher-boys; but by their ability and good conduct they had taken the highest place. He hoped he had said enough to show that this was a matter of Imperial importance, entitling it to the prompt and earnest attention of the Government. He would remind the House that the industries of Ireland were mainly confined—first, to her agriculture and such manufactures as were employed in converting the raw products of agriculture into articles of consumption; secondly, to her internal and external commerce, which was inconsiderable; thirdly, to her inland and deep-sea fisheries; and, fourthly, to her railways, which could not properly be called industries, but conduced to them by affording expeditious and cheap means of transit. The natural conditions of the country imposed upon Ireland considerable industrial limitations. The two great constituents of manufacturing industry—iron and coal—were not found in sufficient quantity in Ireland. He might observe that the export from Great Britain of iron, steel, and cotton manufactures, in the production of which coal and iron formed an important constituent part, amounted to nearly one-half of the total exports of the United Kingdom. The industries existing in Ireland bore but a small proportion to those of Great Britain. The products of agriculture were little over £40,000,000 annually; but some of the raw products of agriculture furnished materials for such native manufactures as linen, whisky, malt liquors, and flour. He trusted that, owing to the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Customs and Inland Revenue Bill, the manufacture of beet-root sugar might soon be added. If they could supplement those industries by encouraging the congenial and appropriate pursuit of fishing, they would contribute to the employment and welfare of the people; but he feared the necessary aid could only come from the Imperial Exchequer, under the authority of Parliament and the sanction of Government. Surely a moderate appropriation for the development of the Fisheries in the shape of loans, and for the construction of piers and harbours, would not be an unwise application of the National Funds, to which Ireland contributed so burdensome a proportion. He submitted that Ireland was not a difficult country to govern when its circumstances and wants were generously considered. But, unfortunately, they had not been considered, to any great extent, in a spirit of earnestness and generosity. Probably too much time and attention had been devoted by politicians who had governed the country to Party interests and considerations; but his belief was that any Government that would earnestly apply itself in the spirit he had indicated to practical measures of utility for the purpose of benefiting the industries of Ireland would be appreciated, and such measures would meet at all times with kindly recognition. They were most fortunate—it was one of the great blessings of the immediate time—in having the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary connected with the administration of affairs of Ireland. He was a man of practical business experience, of wide views, and who would not be trammelled by the narrow prejudices which theorists or economists might advance for the purpose of tying the hands of the Government, and preventing them doing anything in the interests of the country. They might confidently anticipate that the right hon. Gentleman, with his kindly sympathies, and his desire to do good, would do his best to promote this and other Irish interests. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be worth his attention to listen to Irishmen who, one and all, desired that Government should aid the Fisheries? Would the right hon. Gentleman be content to let them die out, as they had been doing, or would he enable them to support 1,000,000 of the people, as the Member for Waterford County said they were capable of doing? In this matter no question arose of landlords' rights or tenants' wrongs. Instincts and migratory laws, beyond the ken of human intelligence, guided the shoals of fish into the harbours, bays, and inlets of Ireland. He only desired that the people should be enabled to profit by those blessings which Providence had placed at their disposal; and if Government would grant reasonable aid, they would do a good, a generous, and a laudable work, for which the people would be grateful. He had great pleasure in moving the second reading of the Bill.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, that in seconding the Motion of his hon. Friend he should confine himself, in the few observations he should make, to three of the recommendations made by the Commission of 1870, presided over by his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford, and their operations in the county which he (Colonel Colthurst) represented, and which contained, perhaps, the largest seaboard of any county in Ireland. The first of these recommendations was that loans should be advanced to fishermen for the purpose of obtaining boats and gear; and as one fact was worth a bushel of theories, he hoped to show by the instance of the Island of Cape Clear the effect which a system of loans judiciously administered would have upon the prosperity of Ireland. He derived his facts from a Catholic clergyman of the diocese of Ross, who had long taken a great interest in the fishing industry, and who was curate of Cape Clear in 1874. In that year the population of Cape Clear was 450, who nearly all derived, or ought to have derived, their subsistence from fishing. But they had only seven small hookers on the Island, with which they could do little. To add to this unfortunate state of things, in some years 500 fishing vessels would come in sight engaged in their annual mackerel fishing off the coast. The value of fish taken at Cape Clear amounted at that time to about £400 in a year. There was no harbour, and the fishermen were obliged to drag the hookers on to the beach when they ran in, or send them somewhere else, to land their slender catches. His rev. informant being a man of great energy and ability succeeded, in 1876, in inducing one of the Islanders, named Patrick Burke, to borrow £150 from the Munster Bank on the security of his landlord, Sir H. Beecher, and he obtained a further loan of £100 from a charitable society in Dublin. With this money the man bought a large boat, went out in 1877 mackerel fishing, and in three months earned £500, or more than the whole population of the Island had earned in any one of the preceding years. His success induced three other men to ask for loans, Sir H. Beecher being kind enough to go security for them in the Munster Bank; and they were earning a considerable sum of money until, in March, 1878, a storm dispersed and damaged more or less some 300 boats engaged in the mackerel fishing, amongst them being the four boats of the poor Cape Clear Islanders. Well, it seemed then as if their prospects were gone for ever, when there came to their aid Baroness Burdett Coutts, a lady whose name was known wherever the English language extended in connection with works of charity and beneficence. She had long taken an interest in the Island, and she not only enabled these four poor men to replace their boats, but she assisted others with loans of money without interest, payable in a series of years. In taking this course she appealed to that spirit which some persons denied to the Irish peasantry—namely, that of self-reliance, but which he believed they possessed, requiring only for its development a little judicious assistance. In this season of 1880 nine boats were engaged from Cape Clear, and they had already earned £4,000, or six times as much as was earned by the whole population in a year previously. He did not expect that the Government, represented as it was even by one so anxious to do good as his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, would give the same assistance as the Baroness Burdett Coutts had given. All he maintained was that the principle of loans at low interest or without interest would be fertile in good results to the fishermen of Ireland. The testimony of the Commissioners to the benefit of loans and of the Reproductive Loan Fund Act, which the efforts of his hon. Friend the Member for Limerick had succeeded in getting passed through the House, was very important. It showed that the Act had been successful as far as it went. The loans had been well used, and, in spite of the present bad times, had been more or less punctually repaid. The Commissioners recommended certain changes with respect to the construction of piers and harbours—for instance, that the choice of the situation should not be left entirely, as it was now, to people residing in the locality, and should not depend on the circumstance that local aid was forthcoming. By the Bill of his hon. Friend the Board which he sought to establish would have a wider discretion than the Board of Works now had; and if it should appear that on any part of the coast there were not piers enough, they might send down an Inspector, who would decide where the piers should be put. He felt bound to say that within the limits of their power he believed the Board of Works were doing their duty, and it was only fair to say that much of an undermanned and over-worked Department. Taking the line of sea coast from Crookhaven to Bantry Bay, extending about 60 miles at least, there was not within that distance a single pier or slip; and there was a large population, especially on the north shore of Dunnannis Bay and the south side of Bantry Bay, engaged in fishing, who year after year lost their boats, and were thus entirely deprived of their means of subsistence for want of a pier. In the County of Cork alone 17 piers were wanted, and had been submitted to the consideration of a Committee now sitting. He hoped that some, if not all, would be sanctioned by the Committee. But some that were most wanted were likely to be left out because of the absence of local interest. They had only just been subjected to the views of the Committee. In these places, where there was a large population but no local aid, people were losing their boats year after year, and their entire means of subsistence, by the want of piers and better approaches to the harbours. Take the case of Cape Clear in reference to the harbour approaches. An immense fishing industry had been developed; but how were the fish to be got to the railway station at Skibbereen? Why, after the steamers had taken it up to a certain point in the River Ilen, they had to unload it into carts, which to get to the railway station had to travel over a very hilly road. If the Island river were improved at a small cost the steamers could go a mile further up, and get better roads to the railway station. Then he would allude to the Island of Ballycotton. There was a pier there; but it was not properly constructed, and he would remind the House that if they would consent to alter this state of things they would be able to make Ballycotton a harbour of refuge. In conclusion, he suggested that the word "barony" should no longer exist in Ireland, and have but one unit in the county, and that should be the Union, a plan which would be a great relief to the taxpayer. He also desired to see stationed on the coast vessels for the protection of the Fisheries, as was done off the coast of Scotland, and observed that if the Government consented to this proposal recent disputes leading to a collision between Trammel fishermen and trawlers, owing to the latter being accused of injuring the inshore fishing of the former, would have been easily settled.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Collins.)

MR. BLAKE remarked that, after the exhaustive speeches of the hon. Member for Kinsale, who had moved the second reading of this Bill, and of the hon. and gallant Member who had seconded that Motion, very little remained to be said on the subject. For the 14 years he (Mr. Blake) had occupied a position in the House he had always taken great interest in all matters affected by the Bill of his hon. Friend the Member for Kinsale; and, having been a Fishery Commissioner for 10 years, he could corroborate all that the hon. Member had said, and, with the permission of the House, he would supplement his hon. Friend's remarks by a few additions. He differed on two points from his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the County Cork (Colonel Colthurst), and thought the sum asked for was insufficient. A sum of £45,000 had been granted towards repairs and purchase of boats, and providing fishing implements for eight counties; but there were nine other coast counties that this sum would not reach, and, in his opinion, £150,000 or £200,000, by way of loan, would be necessary to put the Fisheries of Ireland upon a proper footing. Now that the land had become so unproductive and that foreign produce had come into such active competition, they were bound to utilize to the utmost every resource that was not fully developed. The seas around Ireland were a mighty farm, where there was neither rent or taxes to pay—room for all—and a rich recompense for those who toiled on it. There were four points which arose in conjunction with this question. First, what was the present condition of the Irish Fisheries; second, were they capable of being improved; third, what would be the best means of improving them; and, fourthly, would the result of the improvements be commensurate with the outlay? He thought that the four points could be answered most satisfactorily, and that the outlay would be fivefold in its results. There were 2,500 miles of coast line to Ireland, the greatest coast line except Scotland. Holland had only one-half the coast line of Ireland, and 150 years ago it produced £3,000,000 worth of fish yearly, which supported one-fifth of its whole population; and there was no doubt that the Fisheries of Ireland, if properly developed, would produce far greater results. Centuries ago these Fisheries had been described to the then reigning Sovereign of England as a mine of wealth, and Charles I. had received £30,000 from the Dutch, and in 1556 Philip II. of Spain paid £1,000 a-year to England for permission to fish on the North Coast of Ireland. At a request of the English fishermen, Oliver Cromwell had put down the Irish Fisheries; and at this day there were at Barbadoes fishermen descendants of those Irish fishermen who had been transported to that Island. The present value of the Irish Fisheries was £700,000 a-year; and he had no hesitation in saying that the produce might be increased at least five times that much, that it could be increased to quite £300,000,000; thus causing a greater source of profit, and adding immensely to the food of the people. How was this desirable result to be accomplished? The Irish fishermen ought to be afforded the means of procuring suitable boats, of obtaining the best implements of their craft, and accommodation of harbours, to which they could fly in times of danger, as well as place their boats in safety when not engaged in fishing. On the West Coast of Ireland, especially, a great deal of life was lost for the want of such harbours of refuge; and their absence caused the men, in uncertain weather, to remain at home in a state of enforced idleness. He thought that £300,000 or £400,000 would be necessary to meet all the requirements of the Irish Fisheries; but, in the first place, £150,000, partly loan, would be of great value. With a loan of this amount, a supply of a better class of boats, such as trawlers and other kinds, could be obtained, which otherwise would be out of the question. Experience had shown that small fishing enterprizes in Ireland were more successful than larger ones. From the £45,000 that had been lent under the Irish Reproductive Loans great results had followed, and £50,000 or £60,000 more might have been satisfactorily laid out. If the Treasury advanced that sum at 2½ per cent, the loss would be recouped by an increased consumption of articles of Customs and Excise, including whisky, also, he was afraid, among the fishermen. At present, there were applications for 100 harbours, of which the Commissioners recommended between 50 and 60. These could not be constructed for less than £150,000. For some years past, owing to some cause difficult to ascertain, the fish got further out, and, in consequence, larger and better boats were necessary to follow them, and so a better class of harbours was required, if such boats were used. It was only natural to ask why the fishermen of Ireland were so badly off as compared with those of Scotland, and why there was no such fishing enterprize as in Scotland? There was no class of people in Ireland who had suffered from the Famine so much as the fishermen. Many of those who before the Famine had followed the pursuit had been obliged to abandon it, and had not been able to resume it. In 1846 there were 100,000 fishermen and 20,000 boats; but, at the present, there were only 2,000 boats and 5,000 fishermen. In the Famine years the use of fish amongst the Irish peasantry, with the then staple diet, Indian meal, caused dysentery, and fish, for the time, ceased to be eaten. Owing to this and their inability to keep boats and gear in repair, thousands of fishermen had to abandon the pursuit. The fishermen and the trade had never recovered since. In some places the Fisheries had been almost entirely annihilated. No aid had been given in loans till five years ago. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), then Chief Secretary for Ireland, stated when he introduced a Bill for the purpose that he regarded it as a tentative measure, and, if it succeeded, the Government would feel justified in making further advances. The plan had proved a great success. A new impetus was given to fishery industry, and they had the concurrent Reports of the Irish Fishery Commissioners that the results had been most satisfactory. He, therefore, confidently appealed to the Chief Secretary to carry out the promise which had been made by the late Government—he hoped he would do, at least, as much as would have been done by his Predecessor. It had been contended frequently that the principle of giving loans to foster an industry was opposed to the principles of political economy. But, on the contrary, he could prove, from statements made by John Stuart Mill, the late Earl of Derby, and the present Postmaster General, that that was not the case. There was nothing in which Ireland had a stronger claim on Parliament than for the encouragement of her Fisheries. Scotland, since the Union, had received £1,500,000 more than Ireland for her Fisheries. Scotland received until a few years ago £7,000 annually for this purpose, while Ireland received only £3,500 down to the same period. Scotland had, in fact, got all she required, and her Fisheries were most prosperous. In 1838 a Bill was brought forward in that House to put Ireland on a par with Scotland. That Bill had the sympathy and support of most of the English Members, and it had the unanimous support of the Irish Members. But a deputation came up from Scotland, headed by the Duke of Sutherland, which reported that great injury would be done to the Scotch Fisheries if that was done, and the result was that the Bill was withdrawn. At present Scotland had got a valuable Fishery Board in Edinburgh, with paid officials and inspectors; and, besides that, they had a magnificent vessel to preserve order among the fishing vessels, and to discover where the shoals of fish might be; while, if Ireland wanted a gunboat, it was so long before it was sent that the necessity for it had gone before it got there. Year after year the Irish Inspectors had asked in vain for a similar vessel for Ireland. In France, under the Empire, if a fisherman lost his boat, it was immediately replaced, and a considerable grant was made towards the fishing interests, the consequence being that the fishing trade of the country added to its wealth, and most of the sailors got their first training in fishing boats. That was also the case in Norway, where great assistance was given to the trade. In Holland the Government had devoted great attention to the Fisheries in former times. The Dutch Fleet which sailed up the Thames was manned chiefly by fishermen, and the Dutchman who had invented the Dutch bloater had done more for his country than any man either before or after him. He also wished to draw attention to the fact that, at the present time, there was a great need of seamen for the Mercantile Marine, and so much so that we were obliged to resort to foreign countries for our men. If they put the fishing industries of Ireland in a proper condition, they would find a large addition would be made to the Mercantile Marine from that body. It was well worthy of consideration whether, as a nursery for seamen alone, the Irish Fisheries had not a paramount claim to the encouragement of the Government. He earnestly and confidently appealed to the Chief Secretary either to assent to the second reading of that Bill, or give his assurance that the Government would bring in a measure on the subject of a similar character. All the Irish Members, from the most Orange of the orange to the greenest of the Green, were united in support of this Bill, and every possible assistance would be given to the Chief Secretary if he took it up. There never was a more magnificent opportunity for the Government to do so much for so little; and he did not think that there was any civilized Government on the face of the earth, save that of England, that would have looked on so long without affording the means of relief. It would be a great discredit to England if, while the Governments of Sweden, Holland, and France had done so much to promote their Fisheries, those of Ireland were allowed to decay for want of sufficient fostering care. He hoped that the Government would show that the Irish Members did not require Home Rule to be carried out in order to develop their resources. The Chief Secretary might rely upon that if only the principles embodied in that Bill were carried into effect, he could ere long have the satisfaction of seeing a valuable but neglected resource converted into a great and flourishing industry.

SIR JOHN ST. AUBYN remarked, that as to any encouragement to be given to the Irish Fisheries, he should leave that in the hands of the Chief Secretary; but that was not the whole point of the Bill. There were numerous clauses relating to the regulation of the Fisheries. The hon. Member for Kinsale (Mr. Collins) had pointed out that the number of boats engaged in the Irish Fisheries had been reduced to nearly one-fourth what it was in 1847, and that the number of those engaged in the Fisheries had been reduced to nearly one-sixth of those engaged at the former period. But he had not mentioned the fact that the number of men who went from this country to Ireland for the purpose of fishing had not decreased, but had increased. The 11th and 17th clauses in the Bill, in which bye-laws were enacted for the regulation of fishermen of an extremely stringent character, and licences were required of those who fished on the Irish coast. These clauses ought to be considered by those who represented English constituencies as well as those who represented Ireland; and he thought their restrictive character was not warranted. At present fishermen from Cornwall, Norfolk, and the Isle of Man frequented the Irish coast, while, on the other hand, Irish boats fished the English coast. He suggested to the promoters of the Bill that both the clauses to which he referred should be struck out, and that the Bill should be confined to the encouragement of the Irish deep sea fisheries alone.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that he objected altogether to the endeavour to establish any analogy between the case of the Cornwall Fisheries and that of the Irish Fisheries. In Cornwall there were a large number of capitalists who were willing to embark their capital in the fishing trade. In Ireland they had no such local capitalists, and the business was one which required a considerable amount of capital. £2,000 was required for the necessary equipment to carry on the business in anything like an efficient manner. It was evident that the Cornwall fishers were so rich themselves, and were so helped by local capitalists, that they did not require the help of the State. The pilchard fisheries of Cornwall were originally established by fishermen from Ireland; and even at the present day there were amongst the Cornish fishermen O'Sullivan's and O'Briens, and he was not sure that there were not men of his own name. Irishmen had thus taught the Cornishmen the trade; and, now that they were trying to get some of it back, he trusted that the hon. Member for Cornwall (Sir John St. Aubyn) would not interfere. In times gone by, too, grants and bonuses were given for the encouragement of the Cornish Fisheries. It was, therefore, ridiculous for those who represented Scotch and Cornish constituencies to come there and say they did without grants, when the original impetus of their trade came from the bounty system which they were now condemning. The present Bill did not advocate anything like the bounty system, as had been stated more than once. They did not want one shilling to be given in the shape of grant or bounty to the Irish fishermen. They wanted that loans should be given to them on good security. He represented a constituency where the distress had been very great, and where the recent loans had been decided upon. Applications were made on behalf of the people of Barna, an industrious, frugal, and energetic body of men, for no less than £20,000 to the Fishery Commissioners. They could not meet that arrangement, as they had only £1,400 with which to do it. £20,000 might seem a large sum; but as there were 1,400 fishermen in the district it was something less than £20 each—not so large a sum with which to purchase nets and other equipments for the fishing trade. A friend of his, Mr. Francis Ward, had written to him to the following effect on the subject of securities:—

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

"I have gone security for some fishermen in Barna for loans from the Fishery Commissioners; so did my brother, and so did also, I believe, Father Carolan, the parish priest. I have not been called upon in any case to pay anything owing to the failure of any of those for whom I went security, nor have I heard of anyone else."

When proposals were advanced on a former occasion the great objection alleged was that nets and such things were so perishable that they did not offer adequate security for the loans; but the letter of Mr. Ward showed that in no case had the people failed to meet their honest engagements. His hon. Friend the Member for Waterford had also made advances to the extent of £1,500, and in no single instance did the loan remain unpaid. He thought that was an encouraging sign, and ought to induce the Chief Secretary to accept the principle of the Bill. He did not see how it could be refused when, in cases where loans had been given, the results showed that they could be given with the most perfect security. He trusted the Government would allow the Bill to pass a second reading.

Mr. SYNAN hoped that the present Government would be more liberal in their action towards Ireland than the late Government. It was somewhat unfortunate that such a Bill as that before them should be brought so late in the Session, when, even if it was accepted, there was not much chance of it becoming law, looking at the state of Public Business. In 1874 a Resolution passed by the House upon a Motion brought forward by him declaring that the decay of the Irish Fisheries called for the immediate attention of the Government, demanded the application of remedies recommended by the Report of the Royal Commission and Select Committees which had investigated the subject, and pledged the House to support any well-considered measure that might be introduced on the subject. How did the late Government carry out that Resolution? It seized upon a miserable charitable fund in Ireland, and gave the Fishery Commissioners of Ireland the power of lending money out of the fund to the Irish fishermen, and it was now asked that a further sum of £30,000 should be handed over to the Commissioners for the same purpose, and for piers and harbours. The late Government had pledged itself to various things if political movements were stopped, but made no grant in the direction now asked for. The present Government, however, would, he hoped, be willing to carry out a proper scheme for the assistance of industry in the country. The hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) proposed a grant of £260,000 from the Irish Church Fund for the purposes of building piers on the sea coast. He thought at the time of that proposal that it was a scheme which Her Majesty's Government should have carried out by a grant from the Imperial Treasury, and not by the use of a fund which should be kept for the purposes for which assistance from the Imperial Treasury could not be obtained. The fishery industry should be sustained and encouraged by grants from the Imperial resources; and, notwithstanding what had been said elsewhere and what had since occurred, he still held that opinion. The matter had been dealt with in the most exhaustive manner by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake), and there was no one so competent to give assistance to the House on the present subject of Irish Fisheries. That hon. Member had argued that it would be but paltering with the question if the Government were to give less than £150,000 for the construction and repair of piers and harbours in Ireland, besides making substantial loans to Irish fishermen to enable them to carry on their calling. The causes of the failure of the Irish Fisheries was well known, and was brought about by a former famine, which swept away the fishermen; and the boats, therefore, decreased in numbers or were rendered useless. No encouragement was then given to the fishing industry, and no help had been bestowed for the development of the industry. Reference had been made to Norway as being in the same position to Sweden as Ireland was to England. There were, however, important distinctions between Norway and Ireland. The former possessed a Legislature of its own, the latter did not; and, therefore, if the Imperial Government did not now do its duty in this respect it would be a ground of condemnation. It was quite unnecessary to refer to any authority out of the House who might be competent to speak upon the question; but he would refer to the present Postmaster General, whose knowledge was well known on the subject, and who had refuted the argument that Ireland possessed energy and capital of its own for the purposes of developing the trade. How could it be supposed that a starving people could act on principles of political economy and advance loans. The question of bounties which had been raised should be put out of consideration altogether. It was used by the opponents of this measure and similar measures; but the Irish people did not wish to return to that old system. They had asked for loans to the fishermen in the West, with a condition of repayment at a fixed rate of interest. There was no Member in the House more ready to meet the English and Scotch Members in the objections which had been raised by them than himself. He would, for one, be ready to make some concessions; but it should be remembered that the Bill had been brought forward solely for purposes of relief of Irish fishermen. He now hoped his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary would deal with the subject in a liberal spirit when he spoke on the principle of the Bill; and if he did so, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Irish Members would not be too hard in their terms nor too exacting in their criticism of his proposals, which he trusted would be sufficiently broad, liberal, and large for the purposes required, and would not be conceived in the same petty and shabby manner in which they had been by the late Government.

MR. BELLINGHAM observed, that his constituents were deeply interested in the Bill; and he hoped it would therefore meet the approval of Her Majesty's Government. According to the last Report of the Fishery Commissioners there were numerous localities round the coast of Ireland where large supplies of fish could be obtained, but where the facilities and appliances for securing those supplies did not exist. It was not the will to reap this abundant harvest that was required by the Irish fishermen; they had the will, but they had not the power. The coast of Louth—the county which he had the honour to represent—was greatly exposed to storms, and the fishermen suffered great hardship and danger from the want of proper piers and harbour accommodation. They were most anxious to develop the fruits of the occupation in which they were engaged, and it was most important that they should be encouraged to do so. In connection with the herring fishery which was largely carried on along the Irish coast, he might mention that at Kilkeel during a recent fishing season there were 200 English, 43 Scotch, and only 75 Irish fishing boats; at Greenore in 1878 there were 22 Irish, 20 Scotch, and 8 Isle of Man fishing boats; at Warrenpoint 50 Irish, 15 Scotch, and 105 Isle of Man boats. These were surely facts sufficient to warrant any Government, not blind to the duty it owed the people, to do something for the encouragement of an industry which, in a poor country like Ireland, might prove an exceedingly great blessing. If the Government gave them that encouragement he felt that a great blow would be given to Irish poverty—that in the counties bordering on the sea a great incentive to industry would be given, and that numbers of poor people would be saved from a condition of starvation. Herrings cured at present in Ireland sell at much higher prices than can be obtained for the highest brand of Scotch herrings, and the prices obtained for the herrings caught on the East Coast of Ireland in summer, and sold fresh in Ireland, Glasgow, and Liverpool, were a great deal in excess of the prices obtained by fishermen in Scotland by their contracts. Another point he would urge on the consideration of the Government was the appointment of unpaid Commissioners, because there was no doubt that unpaid Commissioners would look after the interests of the locality in which they resided and had themselves an interest, better than paid Commissioners. County Louth was not one of the counties under the Reproductive Loan Fund; the operation should be extended so as to include it, and thus facilitate the promotion of piers and harbours.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, he did hope the Bill would receive the hearty support of the Government, for surely it was the duty of any good Government to do all in their power for the welfare of the country under their rule. It had already been pointed out that one of the most valuable resources of Ireland were her Fisheries; and that they were very valuable was proved by the way in which they were appreciated by fishermen from other countries. The

hon. Baronet the Member for West Cornwall (Sir John St. Aubyn) had alluded to the fact that the Cornish fishing boats went over to the coast of Ireland to such an extent that he regarded with considerable interest the provisions of the Bill as being likely to affect his constituents. He might observe, in passing, that the clauses of the Bill to which the hon. Baronet had referred were intended only to save life. The object was to provide that fishing boats, which went out for deep sea fishing, should be well found, and that the lives of those on board them should be protected as far as possible. As he had observed, the fact that the Cornish fishermen went over in great numbers to the Irish coast showed how valuable those Fisheries were. He lately saw Youghal Harbour absolutely crowded with boats from the Isle of Man—boats which were splendidly equipped, and which were reaping a golden harvest. Now, it was a melancholy thing that while those Manx boats were taking loads of fish from the coast, the poor native fishermen were obliged to look on, and see the harvest gathered from their very doors by strangers. There was no helping hand to enable them to gather it in; and thus they were obliged to see their own fish, so to speak, carried away from the country. The fact was that, surrounded as Ireland was with valuable fisheries, the men had not boats and nets to take the fish. In former times they would have been able to borrow money from the banks; but one of the misfortunes of the present crisis was that the credit system had broken down, and that resource was thus lost to them. Indeed, since the failure of the City of Glasgow Bank, not only had the banks, which formerly would have made advances, rushed into the opposite extreme, and kept their money as tightly as possible, but the tradesmen were in a half-bankrupt state, and would not let their goods go, except for ready money, which these poor men had not got. If they were enabled to go out and have a turn at those shoals of fish, which he heard at the present moment were off the coast, it would render them independent for 12 months to come; but as things were, it was much to be feared that, unless something were done—in fact, it was quite certain they would be left perfectly destitute when the winter came, and would be thrown upon the Relief Fund. Moreover, besides the loss to the fishermen, the inland population were also losing the important resource of the cheap and abundant supply of food which ought to be furnished to them from the Fisheries. He found in the Bill now before the House a clause which would exactly meet the difficulty, and which presented a favourable opening to the Government to show that they were in earnest in the professions that they had made of a friendly interest in the welfare of Ireland, and of a sincere desire to do the utmost that they could to remedy any grievance that she suffered under. It had been said that England's difficulty was Ireland's opportunity; but the converse was also true that Ireland's difficulty was England's opportunity, and the present moment was such a golden opportunity of winning the goodwill of the people of Ireland by coming forward to help them in a generous spirit. There never had been a time when it was more important to give Ireland a helping hand. The usual sources of credit were cut off, and the country was reduced to the greatest state of want and destitution. Both landlords and tenants were in difficulties, and could do nothing to help themselves; and, therefore, the English Government had the greatest possible excuse for coming forward, and, even at the risk of trespassing upon the rules of political economy, rendering a generous assistance to Ireland. The Government had already done for Irish farmers the very thing which he hoped they would consent to do for the Irish fishermen. The Seeds Bill, which the late Government supported, had been of the greatest service to the farmers of Ireland. But for that Bill hundreds and hundreds of farms would have remained unproductive; but its assistance had afforded the one bright gleam of hope that they had in the prospect of a bounteous harvest. Well, the sea was the fisherman's farm, and nets were to the fisherman what seeds were to the farmer; and, therefore, he hoped that, if only for the sake of that clause which dealt with loans for gear, this Bill would be accepted. Clause 27 of the Bill provided that—

“Whereas it is expedient that loans should be made to fishermen engaged in deep sea fisheries, in order to enable them to provide suitable boats, nets, and gear, such loans should be made under the superintendence of Commissioners hereby appointed.”

And Clause 29 provided—

“That, for the purpose of enabling the Commissioners to make such loans, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the Treasury, and they are hereby required, within one month after the passing of this Act, to advance out of the Consolidated Fund £30,000, to be applied by the said Commissioners in making such loans.”

Now, surely that was a very small and moderate demand. It was a very modest petition that they were making to relieve the fishermen all round the coast by providing that small sum. A book had been placed in his hands by his hon. Colleague in the representation of Waterford—of which book that hon. Gentleman was the author—in which mention was made of the loan that was advanced in 1848. The present crisis approached, in many of its features, the crisis of 1848, when, according to the work he had mentioned, the Dungarvan fishermen, in dire distress, pawned and sold as much of their boats and gear as they could, and were at last driven to burn the masts, oars, and lining of the boats for fuel. A number were received into the workhouse; but several, who could not obtain admission there, or employment at the relief works, found a premature grave. Proceeding with his quotations, the hon. Member showed that the result of a small loan of £300 from the Auxiliary Relief Committee of the Society of Friends was almost incredible. Whereas a short time before there were scarcely half a dozen boats out of a hundred on the coast that were seaworthy, directly afterwards numbers of boats and hundreds of men were fishing; and from that time they were enabled to earn their own livelihood. They were indefatigable, too, in fulfilling their engagements; and the Rev. Mr. Alcock, the Protestant clergyman, bore witness to the changed condition of things. That small loan was the means of working such great good in that district; and, of course, what happened in that district might be taken as a sample and an illustration of the good that might be done on a more extensive scale in the whole coast district of Ireland. He hoped it would not be said that, whilst they hardly counted the cost of warlike preparations, but spent money by millions on such unproductive objects, they grudged a few thousands in developing a peaceful industry at home, and in rescuing an honest and hard-working class from poverty and destitution. Millions had been spent lately in securing "scientific frontiers" thousands of miles away; but, by the expenditure of a very small portion of that great outlay, the truly scientific frontier of a prosperous, contented, and grateful people might be established nearer home. He hoped the Government would not allow the opportunity to pass which was now presented. It fell in well with the present crisis, and with the measure they were now engaged in passing for the relief of Irish distress, for it would relieve a very important class of Irishmen—the coast fishermen. Let them lend those men a helping hand, and they would inspire a grateful feeling in the hearts of the people of Ireland.

MR. EWART said, a large amount of the fish taken in Irish waters were taken not by Irish, but by Manx, Welsh, Cornish, and French fishermen. He admitted that, to a certain extent, the failure of the trade hitherto was due to want of energy on the part of the people of Ireland; but they had a great deal to contend with, especially on the West Coast. The disadvantage under which they had laboured in regard to the difficulty of getting their fish to the market was every year disappearing as the means of communication improved; and if they had a fresh start the industry would rapidly develop, and much good would be done. He hoped that the Chief Secretary, who had a golden opportunity of doing something for Ireland, would give the Bill his best consideration, and endeavour to render to that country an act of justice. The Irish Members were asking only for that which had been done for other parts of the United Kingdom. He believed Ireland had been the victim, to a certain extent, of political economy. The introduction of Free Trade had undoubtedly been beneficial to Great Britain; but it had injured the interests of Ireland as a producing country, and he could only hope that his hon. Friend's Bill would meet with a favourable reception from the Government.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) had made a personal allusion to him, and had challenged him to contradict his statement that the Jackal was not employed by the Admiralty for the protection of the Scotch Fisheries, but by the Fishery Board. He did not see why personal allusion had been made to him, because he (Sir Alexander Gordon) had only come down for the purpose of listening to the debate, which touched a subject in which his constituency were largely interested. One paragraph of the Report of the Fishery Board of Scotland stated that the Admiralty had sent Her Majesty's ship Jackal for the protection of the herring fishers on the coast of Scotland. Would that convince him that the Admiralty had something to do with the sending of the Jackal to the coast of Scotland? Not only the Jackal, but four other vessels, were sent the year before last for the protection of the Scotch Fisheries, and for this reason, that the fisheries on the East Coast of Scotland—that was to say in the North Sea—were frequented by Dutch, French, and Norwegians, and the vessels in question were sent to the fishing ground as a sort of police. Foreigners went there with their large heavy vessels, and kept at sea for a week or more at a time, while the Scotch sent out small boats, which came home every night. These foreigners interfered with our people, and broke their nets; and it was necessary to have the vessels on the spot for their protection, as well as to prevent foreign vessels from coming within territorial waters. The herring often came close to the shore, where large takes were often had, and it was desirable that outsiders should keep out of these waters. As the hon. Member had appealed to the Scotch custom in support of this question, he would say a few words on that custom; and he wished to preface his remarks with the avowal that he had no hostility whatever to the Bill, or to the money asked for being granted. If £200,000 were given to Ireland, Scotland would, perhaps, get about £10,000—that was generally about the proportion that would fall to Scotland. The hon. Member had stated that Scotland had received since the Union £1,500,000 more than had been given to Ireland; but he would call his attention to a Return which gave the amounts granted for piers and harbours in the United Kingdom since 1800. Scotland, it appeared, was granted £613,612, while Ireland had received no less than £1,881,415, which was £1,200,000 more than had been received by Scotland for the past 80 years. He would also point out what was very important in the consideration of this question, the difference between the Irish and Scotch Fisheries, and the reason why in Scotland there was a Fishery Board. The object of that Board was to control the branding. The East Coast Fishery was entirely supported by the custom from Germany, and dealers from that country would never take a barrel of herrings unless it was branded, because that process saved a great deal of trouble in the purchase. The brand, in fact, enabled the purchaser to know the number and character of the herrings, otherwise they would have to open each barrel before making a purchase, which would be a serious inconvenience. Hon. Members had asked to have vessels placed on the Irish coast; but if there were no foreigners on that coast to interfere with the fishermen, there could not be any object in having vessels to keep them away. The herrings on the West Coast of Ireland were not suitable for the foreign market. They were large, light, and soft, and would not take the pickle. Another difficulty that would be observed in the way of getting a market for Irish fish was that it was much easier to get them conveyed from the East Coast of Scotland to Germany than from the West Coast of Ireland to the same country. The fact was that herrings in Ireland were bought in a fresh state, and in that form brought higher prices than the cured herrings of Scotland. There was no object to be gained, therefore, in introducing branding into Ireland, and this had been made plain by the Report of the Irish Fishery Inspector, who stated distinctly that branding would be of no avail in Ireland, and that, therefore, there was no need of a Board, such as existed in Scotland. He was surprised that no allusion had been made in the debate to this Report of the Irish Fishery Inspector. Then there was a complaint about there not being any harbour of refuge between Queenstown and the Nore. He had heard of several, and therefore did not know what was alluded to. [An hon. MEMBER: Ireland.] He might point out that the Nore was not in Ireland. The fish in Ireland were unsuitable for curing, and the reason was that Ireland and the sea coast was affected by the Gulf Stream, which was not the case with regard to the East Coast of Scotland, and that was the secret of the whole difference between Scotch and Irish fish. One argument in support of this Bill had been that London would, if the advantages asked for were conceded, be supplied with fresh fish from the West of Ireland; but, for his part, he was inclined to think that London dealers preferred getting their fish from Yarmouth and places near at hand. He hoped, however, the Government would do all in its power in support of Irish Fisheries, but on the understanding that they did not require to have a brand. Another remark occurred to him on the subject. It had been stated that strangers were to be found fishing on the coast of Ireland, and that would seem to indicate that there were harbours of some kind on the West Coast. They had not in Scotland a single harbour, except a tidal one, between the Firth of Forth and the North of Scotland, and yet they managed to get a very good living out of the fishing. The Scotch trusted to their own resources, and perhaps they had as much enterprize as most people.

MR. CALLAN urged the Government to aid in the establishment of fishing stations, such as Arklow, Balbriggan, and Kilkeel, and to afford facilities. He pointed out that in his own experience he had seen at Carlingford upwards of £1,000 worth of fish devoted to manure owing to the want of a curing station in the neighbourhood. This was simply the experience of one night's fishing. He hoped the Government would take the question of establishing curing stations into consideration. The fish to which he referred had arrived just too late for the Greenore boat to Holyhead, and had there been a curing station on that part of the Louth coast a great loss would have been avoided. They were always sure to hear from some Scotch Member in such debates that the Irish people should depend more on their own resources; but what if they had nothing to depend on? He utterly denied the statement of the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Ewart) that there was any want of energy, so far, at all events, as the Mourne fishermen were concerned. The fishermen would gladly, for a loan, pay any interest up to 5 per cent, and give ample security. He reminded the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) that it was not the Nore they had been talking of, but the North, and urged that a gunboat was much needed in the North of Ireland to prevent the irregularities committed by Scotch fishermen, who were more complained of than Cornish or Isle of Man fishermen. In conclusion, he begged to point out how advantageous it would be for the Black Country and other parts of England if a constant supply of Irish fish could be secured; and he thought that this Bill, if carried, would benefit not only Ireland, but England.

LORD JOHN MANNERS thought that in the course of the discussion the conduct of the late Government in the matter of the Irish Fisheries had been unnecessarily criticized. But, setting aside all past differences and asperities, he would suggest whether it were not possible, under the existing novel circumstances of the case, that Her Majesty's Government might not be induced to take a favourable view, he would not say of this particular Bill, but of the question with which it was connected. The Bill was introduced under totally different circumstances to those which existed when the question was previously discussed. It had to be regarded now more especially with reference to the question of making provision against the recurrence of distress. The tendency of the measures of relief which hitherto had been passed was to leave the people dependent upon the potato crop, and all experience showed that that was not sufficient. He was old enough to have taken an active part in the proceedings of Parliament in connection with the last great Famine; and, in his opinion, the only great measure which was then suggested was the proposal of Lord George Bentinck for a wholesale system of railways in Ireland. That measure had for one of its main objects the development of the Irish Fisheries. The scheme was rejected, most unfortunately, as he thought; but, since then, limpingly, haltingly, interruptedly, and in many ways, no doubt, almost uselessly, railways had been carried out, more or less, throughout the country. Therefore, the Government had now much more reason to induce them to regard with consideration a scheme which had for its object the development of the Irish Fisheries, because they had railways and steamboats to carry the fish from the West Coast of Ireland to the centres of industry. The only question now was whether it was wise for the Imperial Government, under the exceptional circumstances of the case, in some way to aid in the development of those fisheries. He did not wish to express an absolute opinion off-hand; but he thought the object to be attained was one of great importance. If by some such proposal as this they could diminish the dependence of the Irish people upon the potato crop they would be doing an enormous good not only to Ireland, but to the United Kingdom. Whether this particular Bill was the best that could be devised he would not say; but he had no hesitation in saying that if the Government were disposed to regard favourably either this scheme or any analogous proposal he should give them his most cordial and hearty support.

MR. W. E. FORSTER quite agreed with the noble Lord who had just sat down that one of the lessons taught by the late distress was that they ought to stimulate their desire and their endeavours to develop industries in Ireland, and the fishing industry was one which had a special claim on their attention, because it was almost the only alternative employment for many persons in the most distressed districts. It was almost the only other resource open to the small cottier tenant on the coast. Without exciting any unpleasant feelings in regard to other controversies, he might say that it was a generally acknowledged fact that the difficulty of the Land Question was much increased by what was called the "land hunger," arising from the occupants of the soil having nothing else to do. He thought the time had gone by this year in which much could be done beyond what had already been undertaken by the Government for the immediate relief of the distress. Without in the slightest degree blaming the late Government, he should have been very glad if the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Manners) could have persuaded his Colleagues to have taken steps in this matter last autumn, which might have had some effect on the pressure of the present necessity. But, allowing that the subject demanded attention, in what way could it be met? The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) had made an interesting speech.

Mr. Callan

Many explanations had been given of the decline of the Irish Fisheries; but he suspected that one cause which had been more hinted at than expressed tended to account for it more, perhaps, than anything else. That was, that the Irish fisherman found it very hard work to compete with his rivals on other coasts, and even on his own coast. The hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had pointed out that the development of railway communication made it easier for the fishermen on the East Coast of Scotland to get a market on the Continent for his herrings than it was for the fishermen on the West Coast of Ireland. There was one thing, however, which to him (Mr. W. E. Forster) appeared hard in the case of the Irish fishermen, and that was the sorrowful fact that they had to see Cornish, Scotch, and Manx fishermen bring their boats into the Irish fishing grounds. But was not that owing very much to what was happening in other trades besides fishing? Small traders found it very difficult to compete with large traders; and the half-cottier, half-fisherman, who went off in his small boat found it very difficult to compete with the trawlers and the large boats which came from other districts. One of the objects which he presumed the hon. Member for Waterford had in view was to enable the Irish fisherman to have the same advantages in respect to large boats as the fishermen of other parts of the Kingdom, and even of the Continent. That Bill, as he understood, proposed in a very experimental way to attain that end, but to an extent which was almost contemned by hon. Gentlemen opposite. His hon. Friend (Mr. Collins), in his moderate and clear speech, asked for a loan of £30,000; but the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) said the amount must be £150,000 or £200,000, and other hon. Gentlemen said much the same. Now, if the Irish fisherman was to be put by State loans in a position to compete with his Scotch and other rivals, he questioned whether a loan of £30,000 would be of much service. He did not think he was a great purist about political economy. Some of his friends looked on him rather as a heretic. He believed that the laws of political economy were as true, and would as certainly be obeyed as the laws of physics if men were machines instead of being, to some extent, not only reasonable, but unreasonable creatures. The science of political economy was made too often to rest on the assumption that men would do exactly what they ought to do to get rich and produce wealth, although owing to folly, passion, or ignorance, very often they did not. Still, it was a very serious question indeed to suggest that any industry should be carried on by State capital. The hon. Member for Waterford was really asking that the fishing business on the West Coast, and perhaps on the whole coast, of Ireland, should be carried on by State loans. If they assented to doing that, many other industries might demand the same thing. But he much doubted whether they would be really helping the industry by that course. State machinery must be much better than he had ever heard of its being if a business which got its capital from the State would be able to compete with a business which derived its capital from private enterprise. The analogy of the case with regard to the fishery at Cape Clear, assisted by private money, could hardly apply to money lent by the Government, because the gentlemen who lent the money had a special interest in the fishery, and there was almost a certainty that it would succeed. The first time he was in Ireland he was much interested in the fishermen of the Claddagh, and attempted to get up a loan to enable the fishermen who had suffered from the Famine to have their nets repaired. The loan did them much good for the time; but he doubted whether they could trust to State machinery for supplying the capital to carry on that trade. But the chief reason why he could not assent to the principle of this Bill he would briefly explain. He had been told at the beginning of the debate that he was responsible for the government of Ireland. This was to a partial extent true; but there were other Members of the Administration who had to be consulted in a matter of this sort. There were those who had to look after the taxes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was responsible for seeing that all the people of these Kingdoms were taxed as lightly as possible, and equally, one country compared with another; and, therefore, hon. Members from Ireland must not regard him as if he were a hard man who had a large box of money, and that he had the power to make a stream of gold flow into their country. In the first place, the money was not his own, and, in the next place, he had not the key of the box. The Treasury must ask what security it was to get for those loans. The hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Ewart) said they ought to be given on good security. Was it easy to lay it down that there would be a good security on a boat or on a net, and might there not be a good deal of hardship in realizing the security when the boat or the net was worn out? He only threw out that remark without saying that it might not be a safe thing to do. That was one principle of the Bill; but then there was another, and that related to a large expenditure upon quays or piers. He was not sure whether the Government had been asked to provide for them by way of grants or loans. [AN hon. MEMBER: By loans.] Well, if it was proposed to undertake such works by loans he thought there was a great deal to be said for it. He would certainly do his utmost to find out how loans could be made for increasing the number of piers beyond any sum they were now giving as grants. One of the principal hopes he had for a better state of things in Ireland rested on some wise and comprehensive manner of finding out good securities in Ireland on which loans could be wisely given at an interest which would be low for the borrower but safe for the lender, that lender being the State. He could not help believing that that might be done to a considerable extent, and one of the first objects for which it could be rightly done would be the extension of piers. Undoubtedly the hon. Member would have some claim for harbours of refuge in Ireland as in other parts of the Kingdom. He did not want to preclude that. It was not, however, by grants on a large scale that Ireland ought to expect or to wish her resources to be developed; but it was by loans made under a wise system, and after finding out that the security would be satisfactory. He did not know what his hon. Friend who had charge of the Bill intended to do. He should be sorry to vote against that Bill; but he could not agree to it, because it would be committing the Government more than they were able to be committed at that moment. They could not commit themselves to the principle of finding capital for that fishing business; and they ought not to commit themselves to finding large additional sums of money for piers until they had found out how the whole coast should be looked at. His hon. Friend might say he only asked for an additional £20,000 for piers and £30,000 for those loans. With regard to the appointment of a Commission, there had been arguments in favour of that proposal; but proof was wanting to show that they ought to have a Commission. He had, to some extent, a fear as to an unpaid Commission. The result of such Commissions was this. Gentlemen who took an interest in the matter were put on them at first; but somehow or other they diminished in numbers, and then the work fell very much into the hands of officials. Very often the consequence was that the high-sounding names which were on the Board were merely a sort of support to the official element, and the whole of the work fell into official hands. He could not support the second reading of the Bill; but he could honestly tell his hon. Friend that the Government would try and find out how they could put those Irish fishermen in a position to take part in what Providence had given them on their coast, and how they could prevent the competition being made more serious than it had been by the circumstances of the trade. And it might be found, after a full study of the subject, that there was special ground for a loan system, and also for special assistance in regard to piers. It was a question worthy of consideration whether any of the Irish Church Surplus ought or ought not to be taken for that purpose. But that was not a matter which ought to be done in a hurry. If they ultimately came to the conclusion to apply any of the Church Surplus in that way, they must first find out how much of that Fund was left, which he did not think was exactly known yet, nor could it be known until they knew what the immediate relief of distress took from them. Then they ought really to have a scheme which would show the great advantage arising to that particular industry; and after that was done the House would be able fully to consider whether they would give it for that particular purpose rather than for any other. He did not know that he could say anything more than to repeat that the subject was one in which he was deeply interested.

MR. COURTNEY said, he did not know what effect might have been produced on his Irish Friends opposite by the speech of the Chief Secretary; but it seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman had been a good deal too conciliatory. He had, indeed, spoken of the difficulty of keeping up industry on borrowed capital; but he had also alluded to the possibility of surveying the whole coast of Ireland, to see what might be done in the way of national help for the improvement of harbours, and likewise to the possibility of finding out in Ireland some security on which loans could be made, the lender being the Imperial Exchequer. If the Chief Secretary wanted to lend money, he would have no difficulty in Ireland. There was nothing on which the Irish people were more united than in the demand for loans; and the suggestion of searching out for a security on which advances should be made out of the public Treasury for the development of the resources of Ireland was one of the most mischievous which could be thrown out in the present state of Ireland and in the actual condition of the Irish people. That Bill had been supported with considerable unanimity by the Irish Members; and, no doubt, when they were agreed, their unanimity was wonderful. The measure included a scheme for the regulation of the coast Fisheries of Ireland. Now, the present Chairman of Committees in that House had acted as Chairman of a Royal Commission appointed to examine into the herring fisheries of the British coast. Well, that authority stated that, in the inquiries conducted by that Commission, one thing above all others became most clear, and that was, that the fisheries of the British coast prospered the more the less the Government did for them, and the less legislative restriction prevailed; and the Commissioners recommended the repeal of all the Acts of Parliament for protecting fishermen by various methods. That virtually amounted to a condemnation of the present Bill by the Chairman of Committees. The Bill also involved a demand of money by loan or grant to fishermen, and for building piers along the coast. Without that assistance the Irish coast was now fished, and fished industriously, by fishermen from Scotland, Cornwall, and the Isle of Man. It could not, therefore, be the lack of har-bours that prevented the Irish fishermen from also fishing it. But it was said it was from lack of capital. What means had the fishermen of other parts of the Kingdom than Ireland of getting capital? They were as poor a class as the Irish. He put aside the assertion that the Cornish fishermen in the last century received bounties. It was true that some of those bounties were given; but the effect of them had long passed away. The argument that the English fishermen had reached, by means of bounties, a certain platform which was denied to their Irish rivals, was analogous to one that had often been used in other Legislative Assemblies in favour of protective tariffs. The noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire (Lord John Manners) said the question must be considered with special reference to the peculiar crisis through which a large part of Ireland was passing. But that demand was not now sprung on them for the first time. For many long years before the present crisis the claim for State aid to Irish Fisheries had been put forward. It had been urged, when attention was directed to the amount of the deposits in the Irish banks, and when they were told that the want of security for the tenant prevented the application of capital to the land. However that might be, he knew of no hindrance in the law which prevented the application of capital to the development of those Fisheries. He believed that the root of the evil they were considering lay, not in the want of capital nor in the want of energy, but in that defect of morality in the Irish character which did not permit the people to associate themselves much together in industrial enterprizes, or, indeed, in other enterprizes. They lacked that self-reliance and mutual co-operation and mutual trust which existed in other parts of the Kingdom. If the House desired to legislate for the ultimate benefit of Ireland, it must shape its course, as far as possible, with a view to correct that state of things. The two great faults of the Irish character were—first, too great a dependence upon others; and, secondly, the indisposition to associate together in industrial enterprizes. The present Bill would tend to make those defects inveterate and permanent. The Irish people should be taught to rely more on their own resources. The Fisheries of our own coast were not really carried on by great capitalists, but by small tradesmen. The fishing boat was divided into shares, the crew having their share, and other people had theirs; and it was because the small capitalist could trust the fisherman, and the fisherman could trust the small capitalist, that those Fisheries flourished. He was now using language which he would employ if he were a Member of an Irish Parliament, and he would resist that Bill as one tending to perpetuate instead of to cure the faults of Irish character.

MR. WARTON said, the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had presented political economy in its most cold-blooded aspect, and his speech was calculated rather to irritate than conciliate the Irish people. He altogether disputed the dicta of the hon. Member for Liskeard, and denied that Irishmen were deficient in morality, indisposed to partnership, or prone to rely unduly on the assistance of the State. This was a time when they had a right to expect assistance; and, therefore, he heartily supported the Bill. He assured the Chief Secretary for Ireland that it would be far better policy, instead of adopting measures which were calculated to set class against class, and to benefit one class by plundering another, to yield to the united wishes of all classes of Irishmen on such a matter as this. This demand was a very small one, and the £30,000 required would soon be realized out of the additional Income Tax and the Beer Duty, the produce of which the Prime Minister had systematically under-estimated. He would rather pay another additional 1*d.* of Income Tax, if necessary, than see the Irish Fisheries neglected. But it appeared that, while the Government did not shrink from dangerous, revolutionary, and Communistic measures, they opposed a Bill like this which nobody ought to object to.

MR. PARSELL said the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had made a charge against the Irish fishermen. That charge had not been made for the first time against Irishmen engaged in different pursuits. He had heard it said often in connection with the manufacturing industry, or want of such industry in Ireland, that they could not succeed because they were deficient in the characteristics which Englishmen and Scotchmen possessed. But it was a very remarkable fact that this "deficiency in moral character" did not pursue the Irish people out of their own country; for in Canada, Australia, the United States, and other countries to which they emigrated, they were succeeding in a very striking manner, considering the difficulties with which they had to contend in all the pursuits in which they were engaged. That was an indisputable fact. The House had to consider how it was that Irishmen who succeeded in other parts of the world were unable to succeed in their own country. The hon. Member for Liskeard had pointed out that in Cromwell's days the Cornish fishermen went to fish at Waterford, and that ever since the Cornishmen had shown themselves better adapted to fish than Irishmen. But what was the reason? In the days of Cromwell fishermen of Cornwall presented a Petition to Cromwell stating that, by reason of the great competition from Irish fishermen, Cornish fishermen were not able to compete successfully with fishermen on the Irish Coast; and they begged that Irishmen might not be allowed to fish in Irish waters. In accordance with their prayer, Cromwell issued orders forbidding Irishmen to fish in Irish waters. But that was not all. Such as were caught doing so, after the issuing of the edict, were made slaves, and sent to the West Indies. That was the history of the competition of Cornishmen with Irish fishermen, and that was the foundation of the superiority which the hon. Member for Liskeard claimed for Cornish over Irish fishermen. Cornishmen got the start, and they were able to keep it ever since, owing to legislation of that kind. The Irish Fisheries had been depressed, from time to time, by English legislation. And if Parliament was asked to put aside a little the principles of political economy now, it was because they had much more rudely put aside the principles of political economy in their dealings with Irishmen in times past. He admitted that State loans to fishermen were objectionable as a permanent means of supporting their industry; but Irishmen had been crippled by several famines—by the notable Famine of 1846—just when Irish Fisheries were beginning to flourish; and, again, another calamity had come which had thrown Irish fishermen back in the competition with other fishermen. He thought, if a moderate loan could be made by the State to fishermen in Ireland, the result would be the establishment of a larger class of boats, which would enable them to compete with Cornish and Scotch fishermen, who were evidently alarmed at the prospect of competition from Irish fishermen, from the way in which they had set the hon. Member for Liskeard against the Bill. Advances previously made had done a great deal of good, considering the limited extent to which they were made, and had been punctually repaid. The moderate loans now asked for would, of course, be on good security. With regard to harbours, he would ask the Chief Secretary whether a limited grant could not be made out of the Church Surplus Fund, in addition to that made by the Treasury, for the purpose of giving harbours on the West Coast, which would be of great utility? The Board of Works had already sufficient information to justify the expenditure of £100,000 or £120,000 with great advantage; and there would be no possible risk of the money being wasted. He trusted, therefore, that they should have the support of Members representing English and Scotch fishing constituencies in the matter. He might mention there were no harbours, as yet, on the Western Coast of Ireland, with the exception of the Harbour of Kinsale. The Coast of Ireland consisted of over 2,500 miles, and only about 350 miles were at present fished by the Cornish and English fishermen, simply for the want of harbours. If, then, they could expend £120,000 or £130,000, so as to extend the fisheries, the food production would be materially increased. Had Irishmen a Parliament of their own, they would be able to provide these things for themselves; therefore, the Government should go a little in the direction in which the Irish Members asked them to go. If the Government could not see their way to a second reading of the Bill, he hoped they would entertain an application for an additional grant of £60,000 out of the Irish Church Surplus for the purpose of small fishery harbours and piers on the Western Coast of Ireland. That would enable Irish fishermen to struggle on until the time came when the right hon. Gentleman would be able to consider this question in all its bearings, and bring forward some comprehensive policy with regard to the subject.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY regretted that the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) should have lent the weight of his authority to support somewhat narrow and old-fashioned notions of political economy. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that there were many large trades in Ireland in regard to which the principle of association or co-operation prevailed more than it did in England or Scotland. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) thought this Bill was by no means an unreasonable, but, on the contrary, a perfectly reasonable, measure. The greatest writers on political economy said it was reasonable to help certain classes in order that they might thereby become able to help themselves.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA remarked, that it would be well to consider where political economy began as well as where it was likely to end. The treatment of Ireland by a British Parliament had been from first to last a complete violation of the principles of political economy. When the hon. Member for Liskeard spoke in such terms of the difficulty of making Irishmen combine for purposes of trade, commerce, or manufacture, he felt inclined to point to the words in the Book of Job—"Who are these who obscure the councils by words without wisdom?" The one great faculty of the Irish people was combination, and there was no people against whom such pains had been taken to break down the principle. In the matter of the Irish Fisheries, the hon. Member for Cork had pointed out how the most violent measures had been had recourse to to crush those fishery interests. What did Ireland contribute towards the Imperial Exchequer? At least double as much in proportion of population as England and Scotland. Under the circumstances, though no one was more ready than himself to subscribe to the principles of political economy in the abstract, when those principles were transgressed, as they were in the government of Ireland, then a measure such as this could not be judged as to whether or not it was in accord with the principles of political economy, but whether or not it was necessary as a compensatory measure to make up for transgressions of political economy, which had been the rule in the Irish government. At the same time, he credited the present Government with the best intentions. For the time they had been in Office they had gone as far in the direction of conciliating Irish interests as it was possible for any British Government to go; but if his hon. Friend went to a division, he should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. O'DONNELL, as the Representative of a borough which previous to the great Famine in Ireland possessed a fishing fleet of more than 120 vessels, and which had now been reduced to about a dozen, added his strong petition in favour of the fishing industry, especially in the South of Ireland. They required a little help, given in a generous spirit and founded upon principles of common sense, in order to make the harbour at Dungarvan a source of wealth and comfort to a very large extent of the population in the South of Ireland. The opening of a line of railway through Waterford had placed Dungarvan in communication with a wide extent of the country. In reply to what had been said by the hon. Member for Lisheard with regard to the practical application of the principles of political economy and government in Ireland, it would not be difficult to show that where a Government had satisfied itself that the circumstances of a country were admirably suited to a certain industry, it was not contrary to the principles of political economy to give that support at the outset necessary to place that industry on a healthy and solid basis. Such a course would recommend itself to a wise Government. All they asked was to have the means of placing the Irish fishing industries in the way to get a fair start. After that, he was certain they would not have to come to the House for grants or loans in their aid.

(Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Poll, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Mr. Birkbeck, Mr. J. C. Lawrence.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHAPLIN, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time, said,

Sir Joseph M'Kenna

he need scarcely remind the House that in the last Parliament a Bill was introduced by the late Administration for the purpose of giving tenant farmers in England security for the capital which they embarked in their farms, and for giving them a right to compensation for improvements which they might happen to make, and which remained unexhausted on leaving their holdings. Among all the questions which arose out of that Bill at the time there was none which engaged more the attention of Parliament than the question whether that Bill should be compulsory or permissive. The Government decided that to make the Bill harshly override all existing and prospective arrangements between landlords and tenants would be inexpedient in the highest degree. In that opinion he agreed with the Government at the time. In the first place, he knew from his own experience, and he thought many other hon. Members had a like experience, that there were many parts of the country in which the relations between landlords and tenants were already on a most satisfactory footing—that the system, in fact, gave general security to tenants for their improvements. He believed that if compulsory legislation had at that time been suggested, it would have been rejected with indignation by the tenants themselves. In the county which he had the honour to represent there was a custom which gave perfect security to tenants for the improvements which they had made on their holdings, and for the capital which they had invested on their farms. That custom was legally permissive—that was to say, it was perfectly open to the landlords and tenants, if they thought fit to do so, to contract themselves out of that custom. No tenant he ever heard of in the county of Lincoln would consent to sign any agreement which practically deprived him of any of the benefits to which he would be entitled under the custom of the county. He always expected that would be the effect of the Agricultural Holdings Act. He always entertained the views which were expressed at the time by the noble Lord who was a great authority on all agricultural matters—Lord Leicester. Lord Leicester, speaking of the introduction of the Agricultural Holdings Act, said—

“We are indebted to Her Majesty's Government for the principle of this Bill, and I trust the majority of landlords will adopt that principle. But they will contract themselves out of it, and take such courses as are best adapted to meet their wants."

The measure passed, and it had been in operation for a period of something like five years. He freely admitted to hon. Gentlemen opposite, who had always advocated compulsory legislation, that to a certain extent that Bill had been disappointing in its operation. It was undoubtedly the case that in many parts of the country, immediately on the passing of the Act, the landlords did what he fully expected they would—namely, they contracted themselves out of that measure. But he was sorry to say that what he did not expect had occurred—many landlords neglected to offer, and many tenants neglected to stipulate for, any agreement whatever as a substitute for it. It was in consequence of that non-operation of the Act in that way that he was induced to introduce the present measure, which he hoped would apply an effectual remedy. The Bill would apply only to future leases coming into operation after the 31st October, 1881. In the first place, leases of 21 years and upwards were excluded altogether; and, secondly, the Bill dealt solely with compensation for unexhausted improvements; other matters being left to the entire discretion of the two contracting parties. It had been his object not to interfere with arrangements which were working satisfactorily at this moment, but to obtain, as nearly as was practicable, absolute security to the tenant. That object he sought to gain in one of three ways. First, the landlord and tenant might agree that compensation should be granted in accordance with the Act of 1875; or secondly, in accordance with the system laid down in the Schedule to the Bill; or thirdly, they might make special agreements between themselves. In default of the express adoption of one of these three courses, the Act would come into operation. The first class was dealt with in Clauses 4 to 50, and he thought those clauses would work well. Next, the Scheduled system corresponded with what was known as the Custom of Lincolnshire. It had been found that the custom was satisfactory, as it gave security to the tenant, and had led to a high and advanced system of farming. That custom extended not only throughout Lincolnshire but also into the adjoining counties, and he had introduced it into the Bill because, as he had said, it was desirable to interfere as little as possible with existing arrangements. In adopting the system of the Bill, the parties contracting would only have to sign a simple agreement to that effect. The third case was where special agreements were entered into. In ordinary circumstances he would have been disposed to leave the question where it was, as the farmers were perfectly able to take care of themselves, especially at the present time, when they were, if anything, in a better position than the landowners. But, having regard to the disappointment which he confessed he had felt at the result of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1875, he had thought it was desirable to go one step further. The machinery for making agreements under the Act was provided by the 4th clause. If it should be found that agreements under the Bill did not work satisfactorily, either party might give notice to the other, and the matter might be settled by reference to arbitration, and the reference should be made under the terms of the Act of 1875. Every agreement under the Bill was to be in writing. He did not propose his Bill as a remedy for agricultural distress, for he did not wish hon. Members to run away with the idea that legislation of that kind would be sufficient to cope with the distress which they had recently passed through. In Lincolnshire the farmers were satisfied with the security which they enjoyed; but in that county they had not been free from the distress which prevailed in other parts of the country; in fact, he rather thought they had suffered more than other districts. But the agricultural interest was on its trial. There was competition from abroad, and high authorities had said that the competition would become still more severe. It might be that farming in the future would not pay; but he was certain of one thing, and that was, that if good farming did not pay bad farming most assuredly would not. To promote good farming it was necessary that the tenant should have security. Information had recently reached him which had led him to form the opinions which he had expressed, and he hoped that the Bill which he had brought forward would afford the maximum of security with the minimum of disturbance of existing arrangements. He concluded by respectfully commending the Bill to the attention and impartial consideration of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

MR. B. SAMUELSON said, that he should not oppose the second reading of the Bill, as it embodied a principle for which he had always contended. But if the Bill was read a second time, he should be glad if, together with the Bill introduced by himself, it were referred to a Select Committee, as there would not be time in that short Sitting to discuss the Bills fully. But he could not but remark on the course adopted by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), and, in fact, by the Opposition generally. In 1879, he had moved for an inquiry into the subject; he had brought facts to show that the Act of 1875 was a failure. But that position was contested by the Opposition, and by no one more strenuously than the hon. Member opposite. The Members of the late Government, and particularly the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon), tried to invalidate his statements. The noble Lord went so far as to suggest that the authorities he quoted might possibly be those of people residing in towns, and without any weight on agricultural questions. At that time he (Mr. Samuelson), was not at liberty to make use of the names of his correspondents; but permission to do this had since been freely given to him, and he only regretted that there was no time for him to do so on the present occasion. But now it appeared that information had reached the hon. Member (Mr. Chaplin) which induced him to change his opinion. Why had not the hon. Member obtained that information a little earlier? The same sources of information which were open to him (Mr. Samuelson) were open to the hon. Member. He (Mr. Samuelson) would now refer to a denial on the part of the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool that the tenants of the Duchy of Lancaster had been deprived of the benefit of the Act. In answer to that, he would ask the attention of hon. Members to Returns which showed that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, the Duchy of Lancaster, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; Trinity and Sidney Sussex Colleges, Cambridge; Merton, Worcester, Lincoln, and other Colleges in Oxford; Eton College, Christ's Hospital—in fact, almost every public body or corporation, except Greenwich Hospital, had contracted themselves out of the Act, and for the most part adhered to the most antiquated customs. But it was the Elections which had suddenly roused the hon. Member (Mr. Chaplin) and his Party to the importance of the question. No sooner was the Dissolution announced than the hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart-Dyke) was sent down to Maidstone to announce that he had been in consultation with the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, and that he should in future support the Resolution of Mr. Samuelson, making compensation compulsory.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that he had called the attention of the House to the matter a year and a-half ago.

MR. B. SAMUELSON said, he found no evidence of the hon. Member's statements in the Journals of the House; but he supposed the hon. Gentleman referred to the Commission on Agriculture which had been appointed; but he (Mr. Samuelson) did not think the farmers would find much comfort in an inquiry which consisted of 10 heads and 145 sub-heads. If the Bill of the hon. Member, which he took care not to circulate till he had taken three weeks to study his (Mr. Samuelson's) Bill, and which was, in fact, little less than another version of that Bill, but which, by the ballot for place had gained an accidental priority to his own, was read a second time, he trusted that both Bills would be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. DUCKHAM said, he was glad to see the change that had come over the spirit of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENTARY DISQUALIFICATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir Eardley Wilmot, Bill to incapacitate from sitting in Parliament any person who has, by deliberate public speaking, or by published writing, systematically avowed his disbelief in the existence of a Supreme Being, ordered to be brought in by Sir EARDLEY WILMOT, Mr. Alderman FOWLER, and Mr. HICKS.

TURNPIKE ACTS CONTINUANCE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. HIBBERT, Bill to continue certain Turnpike Acts, and to repeal certain other Turnpike Acts; and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT and Mr. DODSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 260.]

EPPING FOREST BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ARTHUR PEEL, Bill to continue for a limited period the powers of the Arbitrator under "The Epping Forest Act, 1878," and to amend that Act, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ARTHUR PEEL and Secretary Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 261.]

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six o'clock.

THE RIVERS CONSERVANCY BILL.

OBSERVATION.

THE EARL OF SANDWICH expressed the hope that the Government would not overlook the Rivers Conservancy Bill, which was introduced in the late Parliament, and passed their Lordships' House, from whence it was sent down to the other House. The Bill was of a very important character, dealing as it did with the superintendence and dredging of rivers throughout the country, and providing for a general system of drainage. He did not expect that they could pass the Bill that Session, but he hoped that it would be dealt with next year.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

(NO. 106.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Preamble agreed to.

Clause 1 (Short title and construction); and Clause 2 (Obligation to make bye-laws as to the attendance of children at school); severally agreed to.

Clause 3 (Power of school attendance committee to make bye-laws).

In reply to Earl DE LA WARR,

EARL SPENCER said, that it gave power to the attendance committees, without a requisition from the parish, to make such bye-laws as they could now make on parochial requisition; and it further gave power to the Education Department to make such bye-laws if the attendance committees failed to do so.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3^d To-morrow.

RUSSIA AND THE PORTE — MR. GLADSTONE'S SPEECHES.

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, in rising, according to Notice, to call the attention of the House to the speeches delivered by the right hon. W. E. Gladstone, respectively at Hawarden on Tuesday, 16th January; at Frome on Monday, 22nd January; at Taunton on Saturday, 27th January, 1877; and to move for a Return of the number of killed and wounded in the late War between Russia and the Porte, said: My Lords, before going on further with this Notice, I should wish to guard myself by mentioning that a precedent exists for adverting in this House to some events in the career of a Prime Minister who happens to be sitting in the other. It occurred in 1827, as regards Mr. Canning. The authority on whom the precedent depends is much too high indeed for anyone to emulate, at least, who sits upon these Benches. But it is not less conclusive upon that account, as regards what falls within the Rules and Usages of Parliament. If no precedent existed, an unusual course might be admitted in an unexampled situation. My Lords, events are so rapidly forgotten when some new conflict which appeals to Parliamentary opinion has arisen, or when new forms of legislation are before us, that events, however recent, startling, and familiar, may escape the apprehension which they call for. When, in March and April, the General Election overthrew the Government appealing to it, the Leaders of the Opposition at that time in the two Houses might have been expected to replace it according to the practice generally followed, unless someone else was called upon by the Sovereign before them. Although no one else was called on by the Sovereign before them, they were not destined to replace it. A distinguished individual, who had openly and systematically renounced all intention of coming back to Office, and acted in a manner little suited to any other prospect, was suddenly precipitated into Downing Street. The return from Elba was not more contradictory or violent. But that was not the limit of the wonder. Although Ministerial explanations in the two Houses of Parliament have attended nearly every crisis we have gone through during the last 20 or 30 years, none of any sort were given in the debates on the Address, either by the new Prime Minister, or those who had submitted to his movement. It seemed to be assumed that the perpetual and inherent order of the British Constitution secured the post of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer to a person who had formally withdrawn from the Leadership of the Party which had gained success, and which was thus required to organize a Government. Under these circumstances, those who, before the usurpation happened, pledged themselves to the opinion that it would be a national reproach and national calamity, may be expected, while the Session is going on, to take whatever course appears to them to have even a distant tendency to shorten it. It will be easy to explain on what grounds the speeches mentioned in the Notice are more properly an object of remark than others more habitually referred to at this moment. The others more habitually referred to were delivered by a candidate. Whoever finds himself in that position must speak, whether he likes it or not, and is not, therefore, a free agent. If what he says is full of much inaccuracy and extravagance, he may remark that it was only meant for the electors, and passed without his wish or sanction to the general community. Even if his language alienates Crowned Heads and puts Ambassadors in difficulty, he may insist that it was the only manner of working on some 200 minds of a peculiar cast essential to his victory. There is no such plea for speeches which can have had no aim restricted to the audience who were present. The case becomes much stronger when these speeches are delivered a few weeks before Parliament assembles; when a legitimate arena is on the point of being re-opened; when it is most unusual for an influential person or former statesman to be seen on the platform; when he can have no aim except to move the public or inflame it; and, apparently, by language he desires to screen from the criticism of the Legislature. So much consideration is due, however, to the absent, that it might be unjust to advert even to these speeches, however little sheltered by their origin, unless you traced the line of conduct which their author had pursued on the transaction they refer to. A few words, however, would suffice for such a purpose, which many noble Lords, if they are inaccurate, can rectify. It seems to me to be accepted amongst the best observers of diplomacy that the present Prime Minister's own conduct in 1870 did much to revive the dangers of the Eastern Question. However, that may be, in 1874 they certainly appeared in the shape of an alliance between three well-known Powers, highly menacing to the results which the Crimean War had laboured in gloom, not unrelieved by splendour, to establish. There was not an effort upon his part to check or to discourage that alliance, although it worked under a banner against which Liberal opinion, by long tradition, had arrayed itself. Those who did determine to oppose it met with every species of embarrassment which he, or his immediate friends, were capable of offering. I can prove that, much too circumstantially, to anyone who questions me. At last, in two years, he came forward, not to breathe a whisper against that formidable system, but to inflame the world against the Empire which it tended to disorganize. It is true that Empire, on many grounds, deserved to be reproached. But the British public were already too much inclined to look with passion on its errors. An incendiary appeared, when a fireman was wanted. His next effort was to form a Party, who would act as the supporters and accomplices of Russia, in defiance of all the lessons which history had originated and foreign policy had settled. It led to some results which are not properly appreciated, besides the obvious one of lending aid where much resistance was demanded. To form a Russian Party is a certain manner of eliciting an anti-Russian Party in the country. The upshot is, that even with that State our relations are embittered by the conduct which professes to improve them. The proposition of confiding in, and co-operating with, a quarter there have been so many reasons for interpreting as adverse to our objects, brings down the weapons which had gone into disuse, and kindles animosity which slumbered. Such a pamphlet as that of Mr. Austin's, which presented, in a burning form, the course of an aggressive Power against all the States it had attacked, would never have existed, unless the right hon. Gentleman had rashly held up the aggressive Power as an object of our sympathy. His step was both misleading to Great Britain, unjust to Europe, and discrediting to Russia. We now have reached the speeches of January, 1877. The charge against them is, that they were fraught with arguments to bring on the invasion which quickly followed their delivery. It is not my intention to give many extracts, because their tenour may be seized without a process so invidious; and because we only have reporters for their language, although, in such a case, they are pretty certain to be accurate. They consist in unlimited denunciation of everything to be found within the territory of the Sultan; invective against the Treaties of 1856; and then, to crown the whole, an anathema against the Ottoman Assemblies, which are described as "an imposture, or something worse than an imposture." Now, my Lords, by far the strongest barrier to the invasion consisted in the Ottoman Assemblies, which were sitting at the moment. While a reforming body was at work against abuses—and seen by all the world to be so—it required no ordinary stretch of humanitarian pretension in any foreign Army to interfere with their proceedings and anticipate their labours. If they could not be suppressed, and the right hon. Gentleman had no power to suppress them, to blacken them, which fell within the range of his unscrupulous activity, was the very course required by the invader. The invader thoroughly commended it. But these speeches had a further influence. They led the Czar to think that he might count on the Party which initiated the War of 1854 as his supporters in the very enterprize which they had formerly defeated. It is now better known to what extent the counsels at St. Petersburg were balanced. We see to which step an overwhelming weight was added. The War began. The next step of the right hon. Gentleman, in defiance of the political connection he had just been leading, was to engage the House of Commons by Resolutions, if he could, to uphold and sanction the aggression. His defeat, indeed, was signal. He but unmasked the aim with which the speeches I refer to had been uttered. When Russian forces reached San Stefano, he was not disposed to sanction any measure for counteracting or retarding them. The Fleet hung back under his auspices. Unless in a sinister moment he had resolved to force himself into power, when he might well rejoice in the attainment of impunity, not a word of retrospective blame would fall upon him from any Member of the Legislature. His own irregular ambition forces it upon us. It is only by reviving circumstances which might have passed into oblivion, that our present risks can be appreciated. It ought to be remembered, therefore, that when the fate of Constantinople trembled; when every object gained by the Crimean War was threatened with extinction; when the Ottoman Assemblies were dispersed; when the Grand Duke was endeavouring to force his body-guard upon the Sultan; when Russia might, at any moment, have become the mistress of the Dardanelles; when Parliament was agitated, night by night, upon the subject, the right hon. Gentleman was so distinctly seen to have promoted this unhappy situation, that his house and life were in considerable jeopardy. In this extraordinary juncture there was nothing to deceive the masses who assailed him. Their vehemence was founded on their knowledge. They were inflamed, because they were enlightened. They saw the peril of Constantinople to involve humiliation of their country. They knew the right hon. Gentleman to be the author of the one and of the other. Reflection of this kind on what occurred two years ago would be, no doubt, uncalled for and objectionable, unless I was enabled at once to point to its connection with the difficulties which surround us. Let it be granted that every idea of retribution or of justice should be thrown out in estimating or in contemplating Ministers. Let it be granted that utility or prudence is the only rule in their selection.

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY rose to Order. He saw nothing whatever in the Motion that bore on the condition of the East. The noble Lord was moving for a Return of the killed and wounded in the War between Russia and Turkey.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: If the noble Lord will listen to my observations, he will find they have a direct bearing on the Motion. The course which I have traced, the speeches I advert to, are the immediate source of the effects which now embarrass and endanger. Russia is encouraged in every form of restless aspiration by the conviction—it may be pushed too far—that she has in Downing Street a firm ally to be depended on. The condition of Armenia—well known to the House—suggests a pretext for advancing from the recent acquisitions, Kars and Batoum, to the Gulf of Scanderoon. In this way the Mediterranean is commanded, and results arise almost equivalent to those the tenure of Constantinople would occasion. It is not easy for the most industrious thinkers upon Eastern policy to invent a barrier to any such encroachment. The reform of local institutions would, of course, annihilate its pretext. But it is vain to take away the pretext, when you offer the temptation which resides in the official power of the right hon. Gentleman. By that circumstance, the elements which form the chronic hazard of the Ottoman Dominion have gained an impulse never previously communicated. Greece is led to think that she may enter on aggression with connivance. The Prince of Montenegro knows that he will win the favour of Great Britain by the very conduct which she formerly retarded. The Prince of Bulgaria has learnt, without the forms of a despatch, that he may now, with little prospect of rebuke, encourage Russian officers who flood over his territory, or sow disorder from the Balkans to Adrianople, or claim the independence which the other Vassals have arrived at, or enter into any other controversy with the Sultan. Austria and Germany, having recently withdrawn from the embrace of Russia, are convinced by the language I have pointed to that the sooner they return to it the more Great Britain will applaud them. If Mr. Goschen is instructed to demand the revival of the Ottoman Assemblies—which he is in a subordinate despatch—the Russian Embassy, who must oppose it to the utmost, have only to explain to the Sultan—his ear may be too open to the counsel—that the Leader of the British Cabinet has held them up to execration; that his real opinion was declared in 1877; that the conversion is as simulated as the anathema was final. Until some change occurs it is difficult to see in what manner the least advance to safety in these questions can be hoped for. It may be said that these remarks, however just, are useless for their purpose. It is not, indeed, within the range of facts or arguments to modify a Government. But facts and arguments are not entirely thrown away, if many groups are seen to have a just dissatisfaction with something recently and unexpectedly and violently forced upon them. I need not touch on those who have been faithful to the opinions of the late Lord Palmerston, by which, in 1856, our policy was guided. They cannot have a stronger duty than to close the usurpation which weighs upon them at this moment, and which of all men Lord Palmerston would have most strenuously resisted. But many noble Lords who sit upon the Treasury Bench are equally entitled to regret it, since it identifies them with language which they never held, with conduct which they may have frequently, however ineffectually, deprecated. But it exposes to far more mani-

fest injustice the Government which terminated at the General Election. To what arraignment were they open? It was that they had feebly contended with the new Holy Alliance. The right hon. Gentleman never once aspired to resist it. It was that they had insufficiently restrained, or not succeeded in averting, the hostilities which followed. The right hon. Gentleman did his utmost to precipitate them. It was, again, that they allowed the Treaties of 1856 to languish in abeyance. The right hon. Gentleman had defied them altogether. It was, again, that at Berlin they sanctioned perilous concessions. The right hon. Gentleman would have sent them to the Congress without a tithe of the inadequate authority they exercised. If the verdict of the General Election against the late Government was just—as I maintain, having endeavoured to promote it—it has led to a conclusion utterly untenable in reason as well as fraught with inconveniences to Europe and perils to Great Britain. The present moment seems to me to be well chosen for a Notice of this kind, because two objects had to be considered. One was to allow the effervescence of Mid Lothian to pass over; the other to prevent society from being too long habituated to the Government in the form which it has assumed, and also to prevent complete oblivion of the facts which show that form to be much more than inadmissible. A task so painful ought to be as long as possible delayed. But, in a short time, the lassitude of Parliament commences. The moment it sets in, everything seems more tolerable than exertion to correct it. If no sort of protest is initiated before that time arrives, we may be led to accede to the present state of things as a stroke of fate, or an incurable disorder. Some noble Lords who share these views may urge that a Motion against the actual formation of the Government would have been a more legitimate proceeding. But there were several objections to it. If carried in this House, it might be counter-balanced in the other. It would involve debate and controversy with the noble Lord upon the Treasury Bench, which I am far from wishing to encounter. As it is, they are not bound to justify the right hon. Gentleman or acquiesce in the opinions I have stated. The Motion, I submit, may be accepted without a judgment one way or the other. It is for a Return which two Embassies can furnish, which has much historical importance at this moment, and which, when it is borne in mind how much the right hon. Gentleman was the promoter of the recent War, enables us to trace at least a portion of his great responsibility. The course I have pursued involves considerable hazard, because in this House the right hon. Gentleman can look to Prelates he has nominated, Peers he has created, men in Office he has chosen. It seems to me, however, to be a law which runs through history, that unless someone is prepared to sacrifice himself, usurped dominion and irregular authority, however fatal, cannot easily be limited. On what grounds their limitation is required in the present instance need not further be insisted on. It is the first step to that repose on Eastern matters to which, after its long fatigues, the country is entitled. The noble Lord concluded by moving for the Return of which he had given Notice.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House, Return of the numbers of killed and wounded in the late War between Russia and the Porte."
—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I own I feel some difficulty in dealing with the speech which we have just heard, and in knowing what point the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stratheden and Campbell) wishes me to reply to. On the 19th of last month the Notice which stands in the noble Lord's name attracted my attention on the Papers of your Lordships' House. I saw by it that the noble Lord proposed on the Monday following to call attention to speeches delivered by Mr. Gladstone three years ago. I came down on that day in the hope that I should be able to learn the drift of the noble Lord's argument, but learnt from the Clerk at the Table that the Motion was postponed till the Monday after. Well, I came down on that day, and was again informed that there had been a further postponement. I make no complaint of that for myself, because it is my duty to come down every day; but complaints have been made by other Peers who may come down, or not come down, according to the bill of fare on your Lordships' Minutes, and I must say that I think it is inconvenient that the noble Lord should postpone his Notices from time to time in the manner he frequently does. I gather, on the whole, that the remarks of my noble Friend were not intended to be complimentary to Mr. Gladstone; but he has paid my right hon. Friend a great and unusual compliment. He has referred to a precedent of a Peer answering a speech made in the other House of Parliament. I presume he means Lord Grey's famous attack on Mr. Canning. I would, however, remind the noble Lord that when that attack was made, Mr. Canning, who was Prime Minister, was acting and speaking in a manner of which Lord Grey did not approve; but the noble Lord has been making an address here on speeches spoken three years ago and when Mr. Gladstone was not in Office, and it would, I think, be difficult to find a precedent of any Peer, who, having neglected speeches made by a man three years ago, who, of whatever eminence, was not in Office at the time, now made them a subject of a long speech in your Lordships' House. The noble Lord concludes with a Motion for a Return which he thinks, and probably it would be, of great interest, but to the production of which I am afraid I cannot concede. How is it possible that the Foreign Office could give a list of the killed and wounded in a campaign in which we had no share, which lasted for a considerable period, extended over wide territories in Asia and Europe, and was conducted by two belligerents, one of whom, however brave in the field, is not renowned for the accuracy of her statistics? I am sorry, therefore, to say it is not in the power of the Government to furnish the information for which the noble Lord moves.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL said, that it was satisfactory to find that the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) had not much to say against the Notice, except that it ought to have come on 10 days sooner than it had done. He (Lord Stratheden and Campbell) hardly hoped for such a tribute to its necessity. If he had adverted to speeches delivered so long ago as 1877, it had been sufficiently explained for what public object he had done so. The Return might be obtained at once by communicating with the Ottoman and Russian Embassies in London. But if the noble Earl objected to such a burden, as too much enhancing those his foreign policy occasioned, he would not divide the House, as the Return was not essential to the purpose he had aimed at.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN, in rising to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government have come to any determination as to what steps are to be taken, with or without the other Powers represented at the late Conference at Berlin, in the event of the Porte declining or neglecting to be guided by the decision of that Conference; and, further, to ask, whether, in the event of Greece receiving an accession of territory, she will in consequence become responsible for a proportionate amount of the Turkish Debt; and, if so, whether she will thereby become liable for any part of the War Indemnity due to Russia by the Porte? said, he thought that the uncertainty of the decision come to at the Conference in Berlin justified him in asking the Question which he was about to put to Her Majesty's Government. They were all aware that the Powers assembled at that Conference had come to the decision that a certain amount of territory was to be given to Greece, and they knew that the decision so arrived at was about to be made known to the Porte; but they were in comparative ignorance as to other points in connection with the decision. He believed, technically speaking, that the act of the Conference might be looked upon as an act of mediation to enable two parties, who could not otherwise agree, to come to an agreement. He thought that the words used in the Treaty were to the effect that the Signatory Powers "reserved to themselves a right of mediation" in order to facilitate the negotiations. He thought there was also a resolution passed to the effect that the Powers were prepared to adopt direct mediation. He was not aware of any difference between direct mediation and any other mediation, and it appeared to him to be only logical to suppose that the Powers which had reserved to themselves the right of mediation must have also reserved to themselves some right to see that their mediation was not ignored. Considering that, and considering the events which had occurred during the last few years in the East, it was impossible not to regard the decision come to by the Conference as something more than mere advice, or ordinary friendly mediation, and something which might possibly be backed up by further action. As regarded the first part of the Question, he thought it had been stated in some of the papers that if Greece obtained an accession of territory, she would be liable to a portion of the Turkish Debt. That was almost invariably the case, except with Irish landlords, who were treated somewhat differently. If so, it would be interesting to know whether Greece would be liable for any portion of the War Indemnity payable by Turkey to Russia, because becoming liable to a Power which would look after the payment was a different thing from becoming liable to individuals. He had no intention of asking the Government to state what steps they were going to take; but if the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Earl Granville) would do so, such a statement would be interesting to the House and the country. The Government must, he supposed, know what they were going to do; and he would like to hear that they knew themselves what steps they would take, either singly or in concert with the other Powers, in the event of the recommendation agreed to at the Conference not being carried out. He, therefore, begged to ask the Question of which he had given Notice.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET would, before the Question was answered, like to take that opportunity of asking his noble Friend, Whether he could lay upon the Table of the House a map of the country, showing the lines of rectification of the Frontier of Turkey and Greece, as the maps in the Library were not such as could be relied upon? As to Greece undertaking to pay any portion of the Debt of Turkey, he had not much to do with diplomacy; but he could not understand why Greece should pay a portion of the Debt of a bankrupt State.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the first part of the Question which the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven) has put to me is of an important character, and belongs to a subject concerning which not only the Government, but all your Lordships, including the noble Earl himself, take great interest. I am, therefore, sorry that I cannot give an answer which is likely to be perfectly satisfactory to him in reply to a Question which, I am bound to say, has been put in his usual clear and straightforward manner. I remember that, on entering the Foreign Office some 20 years ago, I learnt from Lord Palmerston a maxim which has always approved itself to my judgment—namely, that, except in very exceptional circumstances, it is not consistent with the duty of the Government to answer hypothetical Questions, or to describe what may be the future policy of the Government upon every possible contingency. Now, there has been a meeting of the Representatives of the European Powers at Berlin, and they have come to an unanimous decision upon one of the points of the Berlin Treaty, and the Collective Note embodying that decision will be conveyed to both Turkey and Greece, but it has not yet been presented. Certainly it is not from any want of respect to Turkey that I state that all the Powers were unanimous in thinking that they had a right to expect that that decision, when communicated, would not be disregarded by the Porte; but it is not for me to assume that the answer to the Collective Note will be a disregard of it, and then to publicly discuss what steps the Powers will be prepared to take in such a contingency. That would, as my noble Friend will upon reflection see, be an improper course for me to take. In reference to the second part of the Question of the noble Earl, I am sure he will see that it would be premature for me to say what arrangements have been come to between Greece and the Porte as to the former bearing a portion of the Debt charged upon Turkish territory; but I may say that care will be scrupulously taken in dealing with the pecuniary rights of the Government which makes the cession, and also the just rights of the landowners will be most carefully regarded, both on the grounds of equity and International Law. As to the concluding observation of the noble Earl, I am quite unaware how in this transaction Greece can become liable to Russia for any part of the Indemnity. In answer to the Question of my noble Friend the noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset), while admitting that the common maps are very incorrect, I may say there are being prepared very accurate maps showing the rectification of territory. I hope soon to be able to present them; but, as the recommendation is a joint act, usage requires that we should obtain the permission of the other Powers before we lay those maps on the Table.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY (TAY BRIDGE) BILL (by Order.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. ANDERSON said, he was well aware that it was a very unusual course to attempt to oppose the second reading of a Private Bill in that House, and in ordinary cases he certainly would be disposed to allow such Bills to go to be considered by a Committee upstairs. But there were special circumstances under which a Member was justified in endeavouring to stop even a Private Bill at the stage of second reading, and he thought he should be able to show that this was one of the cases in which such a course ought to be pursued. He might say that the Amendment which had been placed on the Paper by the President of the Board of Trade since he (Mr. Anderson) had put his own Amendment on the Paper was in itself a sufficient justification for his opposition, because he observed that that Amendment proposed to change entirely the constitution of the Committee to which the Bill was to be referred, and to widen the Reference to that Committee in a very remarkable degree. He thought that proposal was of itself enough to show that to attempt to stop the Bill on the second reading was not unwarranted. It was hardly necessary to remind the House of the circumstances connected with the unfortunate Tay Bridge. In 1870, the North British Railway Company came to that House and got powers by an Act of Parliament to build a bridge, which was to be two miles long and to cost £350,000. Hardly anyone, at the time, believed that it could possibly be built for that sum. He had heard that it ruined the first contractor, because the sum was so small. Afterwards, the Company had to hand it over to another contractor; but what had turned out to be the case was very evident from the first—namely, that in order that any contractor might make the thing pay, the work had to be scrimped and scamped from the very beginning and all through its stages. He was informed that the Canada Bridge at Montreal was exactly of the same length—two miles—and it cost over £1,000,000 of money, and yet it was proposed to build this Tay Bridge, at a time when prices for iron were exceedingly high, for £350,000. Well, when the bridge was built, it was looked upon with considerable suspicion. Many of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood refused to travel by it; they would send their goods and coals over it, but they would not trust themselves upon it.

Earl Granville

Things went on safely for a time; but, on the 28th December last, a gale came that was too strong for the structure. The result was that the bridge broke down, and a train full of people was hurled down into the river—into a certain and instant death. Since then some inquiries had been going on. Mr. Rothery, the Wreck Commissioner, Colonel Yolland, and Mr. Barlow had made an inquiry, and the public had had the details from day to day. The evidence had been of the most damaging character to all concerned, and especially to the engineer. Yet, notwithstanding this, the North British Railway Company had continued to trust that engineer, and had employed him to prepare plans and specifications for the restoration of the bridge. The House had now, from the Commissioners, a Report of the circumstances. That Report was altogether of a very damaging character; and, with the leave of the House, he proposed to read a few extracts from that Report. He did not propose to go into full details, but only to quote those passages which bore most strongly upon the disaster. Some of the conclusions were—

“That the wrought iron employed was of fair strength, though not of high quality as regards toughness; that the cast iron was fairly good in strength, but sluggish when melted, and presented difficulty in obtaining sound castings.”

[The unsoundness of the castings was, no doubt, one of the causes of this misfortune, and this was produced by the employment of a very low class of Middlesbrough iron.]

“That the girders which have fallen were of sufficient strength, and had been carefully studied in proportioning the several parts to the duty they had to perform. In these girders some imperfections of workmanship were found; but they were not of a character which contributed to the accident, and the fractures found in these girders were, we think, all caused by the fall from the tops of the piers; that the iron piers, used in place of the brick piers originally contemplated, were strong enough for supporting the vertical weight, but were not of a sufficiently substantial character to sustain, at so great a height, girders of such magnitude as those which fell.”

The original idea was to build the bridge on brick columns; but, owing to some blunder in the making of the foundations, it was found necessary to make a change, and to erect iron columns instead, and those iron columns were of such bad design, and so imperfect in construction, that they were unable to sustain the weight required of them. The Commissioners, in their Report, proceeded—

“We think that the workmanship and fitting of the several parts comprising the piers were inferior in many respects. We think that the great inequality of thickness in some of the columns, the conical holes cast in the lugs, and several imperfections of workmanship which have been ascertained by this inquiry, ought to have been prevented.”

Then they went on to point out that there was no proper supervision over the bridge after it was erected; that the ties of the cross-bracings had been tightened up and brought up to their bearings before the date of the inspection by General Hutchinson, and that the fact that so many of them became loose was an evidence of weakness in this part of the structure. Then they said—

“That notwithstanding the recommendations of General Hutchinson that the speed of the trains on the bridge should be restricted to 25 miles per hour, the Railway Company did not enforce that recommendation, and much higher speeds were frequently run on portions of the bridge. That the fall of the bridge was occasioned by the insufficiency of the cross-bracing and its fastenings to sustain the force of the gale on the night of December 28th, 1879, and that the bridge had been previously strained by other gales.”

He would not occupy the House longer upon that point; but would direct their attention to the fact that Mr. Rothery differed somewhat from his two colleagues in his Report. Mr. Rothery differed from the other Commissioners in a way which rendered him entitled to the thanks of the public. His two colleagues, while they agreed with him as to the causes of the disaster, declined to award or apportion the blame of that disaster. Mr. Rothery, however, with that moral courage which was highly creditable to him, and for which they ought to thank him in every way, boldly took the thing in hand and proceeded to apportion the blame. He said—

“I agree with my colleagues in thinking that there is no evidence to show that there has been any movement or settlement in the foundations of the piers; that the wrought iron was also fairly good, though sluggish in melting; that the girders were fairly proportioned to the work they had to do; that the iron columns, although sufficient to support the vertical weight of the girders and trains, were, owing to the weakness of the cross-bracing and its fastenings, unfit to resist the lateral pressure of the wind; that the

Then Mr. Rothery went on to state that he thought it was their duty to call attention to certain defects in the design which rendered the structure weak and thereby contributed to its fall. He said—

"It seemed to me, also, that we ought not to shrink from the duty, however painful it might be, of saying with whom the responsibility for this casualty rests. My colleagues thought that this was not one of the questions that had been referred to us, and that our duty was simply to report the causes of, and the circumstances attending, the casualty. But I do not so read our instructions. I apprehend that if we think that blame attaches to anyone for this casualty, it is our duty to say so, and to say to whom it applies. I do not understand my colleagues to differ from me in thinking that the chief blame for this casualty rests with Sir Thomas Bouch; but they consider it is not for us to say so. The conclusion to which I have come is that this bridge was badly designed, badly constructed, and badly maintained, and that its downfall was due to inherent defects in the structure which must, sooner or later, have brought it down. For these defects, both in the design, the construction, and the maintenance, Sir Thomas Bouch is, in my opinion, mainly to blame. For the faults of design he is entirely responsible. For the faults of construction he is principally to blame, in not having exercised that supervision over the work which would have enabled him to detect and apply a remedy to them. And, for the faults of maintenance, he is also principally, if not entirely, to blame in having neglected to maintain such an inspection over the structure as its character imperatively demanded. I think, also, that Messrs. Hopkins, Gilkes & Co., are not free from blame for having allowed such grave irregularities to go on at the Wormit Foundry. Had competent men been appointed to superintend the work there, instead of its being left almost wholly in the hands of the foreman moulder, there can be little doubt that the columns would not have been sent out to the bridge with the serious defects which have been pointed out. The great object seems to have been to get through the work with as little delay as possible, without seeing whether it was properly and carefully executed or not. The Company also are, in my opinion, not wholly free from blame for having allowed the trains to run through the high girders at a speed greatly in excess of that which General Hutchinson had suggested as the extreme limit. They must or ought to have known, from the advertised time of running the trains, that the speed over the summit was more than at the rate of 25 miles an hour, and they should not have allowed it until they had satisfied themselves, which they seem to have taken no trouble to do, that the speed could be maintained without injury to the structure. It remains to inquire whether the Board of Trade are also to blame for having allowed the bridge to be opened for passenger traffic when they did. After what has come out in the course of this inquiry, it is clear that there can be no justification in future for disregarding altogether, as it seems to have been done, the effect of wind pressure on such a structure as this. But, whether General Hutchinson is or is not to blame for having so done, Sir Thomas Bouch is not relieved from his responsibility."

"Although this bridge, if properly constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications might, as we are told, have been capable of resisting a lateral pressure of from 60lbs. to 70lbs. per square foot, and a very much greater wind pressure than was probably brought to bear upon it on the evening of the 28th of December, it by no means follows that, constructed and maintained as we have seen it to have been, a very much lower pressure would not have sufficed to blow it down. With its conical bolt holes in the lugs and in the flanges of the 18-inch columns; with its lugs, shown by experiment to be unable to bear more than one third of the pressure due to their sectional areas; with the wind ties by which the columns were held in position loose, and with no effective supervision of these cast iron columns; and their attachments to see that they were doing their work properly; and with all these and the other defects to which we have called attention, can there be any doubt that what caused the overthrow of the bridge was the pressure of the wind acting upon a structure badly built and badly maintained?"

The Report, as he (Mr. Anderson) had said, was altogether of an unsatisfactory character to all parties concerned. It showed that the design of the bridge was bad, that the castings were bad—in fact, that everything connected with the bridge was defective. The blame was evidently mainly and principally due to the engineer for designing and constructing this wretched sham; but he had been knighted instead of being disgraced for building the miserable structure. The contractors were to blame for their inferior work, although they were driven to that by the inferior prices paid them; and the railway directors were to blame for paying inferior prices, and for having run trains over the bridge at a higher rate of speed than that recommended by

General Hutchinson. The hon. Gentleman was proceeding to make further quotations, when—

MR. DODDS rose to a point of Order. The question before the House was whether they should read a second time the North British Railway Bill. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) was making observations which seemed to him (Mr. Dodds) to be entirely addressed to the consideration of the Report which had been recently made public, and which might form a very proper subject of consideration in the House, but did not arise upon the question before them.

MR. ANDERSON said, that if the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) would wait a few minutes, he would see the bearing of the quotations.

MR. SPEAKER: The observations of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) are relevant to the subject matter before the House, and, therefore, they are quite in Order.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodds) would soon see the bearing of the quotations upon the new Bill that was proposed to be brought in. General Hutchinson said he would like to have an opportunity of observing the effect of a high wind upon the bridge while a train was passing over it. That was a very significant and a very prophetic statement, which showed that the danger was present in the mind of General Hutchinson, and yet General Hutchinson did nothing more than suggest it as a scientific theory; he did not seem to have attended to its probable effect on the safety of the public on whose behalf he was sent to inspect the bridge. He (Mr. Anderson) must now pass to the bearing of all this upon the new scheme. What the House had now to consider was whether, under the circumstances which he had narrated, it would allow the very same parties who were to blame to come before the House in the last month of the Session, and endeavour to rush through Parliament a Bill, not for the construction of a new bridge, with new plans, and under a new engineer, but for the patching up of this miserable broken structure. ["No, no!"] It was a simple fact, which hon. Members could satisfy themselves upon. He maintained that it was contemplated by the Bill to patch up the old bridge. He had examined the plans and specifications, and he found they were signed by Sir Thomas

Bouch. That was sufficient proof that what he said was correct. What happened to the bridge in December last was enough to show that the House ought not to intrust the same architect with its restoration. His reason for opposing the Bill was that there was not time for a Committee upstairs to sufficiently consider the difficulties they had before them in the matter. He did not regard the late disaster as an accident at all. The collapse of the bridge was a forgone conclusion; and yet the very same parties who built the bridge, who built it with such insufficient work, and with such insufficient care, now came before the House again, when some of them ought to be, he believed, standing in a criminal dock to answer for their neglect. He (Mr. Anderson) had been taunted that he was opposing the Bill in the interest of a rival Railway Company, and in the interest of the preference shareholders of the North British Railway Company, who did not approve of the Bill. He put his Notice of Opposition on the Paper after reading Mr. Rothery's Report, and before he had communicated with anybody on either side of the question. Since then he had been communicated with by both sides to a large extent. He had, however, nothing to do with all that. He had nothing to do with the interests of rival and contending railways; all he cared for in the matter was the safety of the travelling public, and it was that he imagined that the House had chiefly to care for. He thought the House ought not at that period of the Session to allow the Bill to go before a Private Committee, who could not possibly have time to consider the whole merits of the question. He begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had some little difficulty in understanding the relevancy of a good deal of what his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had quoted from the Report on the Tay Bridge disaster to the Motion for the second reading of the Bill. At the same time, he must admit that that very important Report did disclose circumstances which might well make them anxious not to be too precipitate, and, above all, not to proceed upon a new undertaking of this kind without the fullest and most careful inquiry. But, on the other hand, considering the great importance of the interests which were involved, especially the great commercial interests of the town of Dundee, which was very largely dependent upon this bridge, he certainly thought it would be a very strong proceeding, indeed, to prejudice the question altogether, and to refuse to allow the matter to be considered. His hon. Friend said that, at that late period of the Session, there would not be time for such an inquiry as he desired. It would be within the competency of the Committee, if they thought it was impossible to complete the inquiry that Session, to postpone the consideration of the question; but he (Mr. Chamberlain) thought, at all events, that it would be in the interests of all concerned that at least an opportunity should be afforded for the settlement of the matter, if it could be possible. His hon. Friend had thought proper to condemn, in very strong language, the action of the Railway Company and Sir Thomas Bouch. He (Mr. Chamberlain) confessed he felt some delicacy and difficulty in adding to the burdens which he thought Sir Thomas Bouch had to bear, and especially after what had happened. But, perhaps, it might be satisfactory to the House if he said at once that he was informed that, at all events, Sir Thomas Bouch would not be responsible for the new works. He was informed that the plans and specifications had already been submitted to other engineers, and that Sir Thomas Bouch would neither sign them, nor be in any way responsible for them. He ventured to hope that, in view of the wide inquiry which the Committee would be able to make under the Instructions he proposed to move if the Bill were read a second time, that his hon. Friend would withdraw his Amendment, and that, without further discussion, they might be able to take this stage of the Bill. He might say that although an Instruction of this kind, widening the inquiry in the way he suggested, was unusual, it was not without precedent. It would be in the recollection of the

House that last Session, when there was a question of some Railway Bill, in which the interests of the carriers were concerned, an Instruction to the Committee was moved in order that interests which were not directly raised by persons who had a locus standi before the Committee might be considered. He proposed, in the same way, to take care that although certain questions might not be directly raised by the parties who appeared by counsel before the Committee, the Committee should have these issues before them, so that they might be enabled to consider the safety of the general public as well as the merely pecuniary interests concerned. In order that the inquiry should be full, ample, and impartial, he intended to propose that the matter should be discussed before a Hybrid Committee with the usual power to send for Persons and Papers. Under these circumstances, he hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow would withdraw the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that as one of the Members for a county which was by far the most affected by the Bill—the County of Fife—he asked permission to say a word or two before the question was disposed of. He certainly failed to see how the long extracts the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had read bore directly upon the present Bill. He did admit, and he was one of the first to assert, that the circumstances which had given rise to the present Bill were a great engineering scandal. It had been his lot to have a good deal to do with engineering matters in India, in connection with the government of one of the Presidencies there; and he must venture to say that if the same gross failures had taken place in connection with any of the public works of that country, the persons who were responsible for them would have been inevitably made responsible. Under those circumstances, he certainly rejoiced that Sir Thomas Bouch was not to be responsible for the new works. At the same time, he failed to see how the matter could be appropriately discussed in the House. A Committee upstairs was, undoubtedly, a more fitting tribunal in which to discuss it. In that view, he hoped that the President of the Board of Trade would so manage matters that the Committee would be able to come to a conclusion in the course of the present Session. There would be great complaints in the County of Fife if the question remained over for another year. At the present moment they were subjected to enormous inconvenience. Their position now was much worse than it was before the bridge was originally constructed, seeing that the ford ferry arrangements had been put an end to and discontinued. They were, consequently, in a much worse condition than they were before the Tay Bridge was built. He only wished now to express a hope that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade would not make the Reference to the Committee which he had placed upon the Paper so wide that it would be almost impossible to dispose of the inquiry in the present Session. It appeared to him (Sir George Campbell) that the Reference was much wider than was necessitated by the circumstances. They knew very well the causes of the accident. They knew that it had resulted from failure and blunder in the construction of the bridge; but the President of the Board of Trade proposed to refer to the Committee much wider questions—questions as to the site of the bridge, the form of the bridge, and various other extraneous matters. He did hope that when his right hon. Friend rose to move the Instruction which he proposed to give to the Committee, he would explain that the Reference he intended to make was not of such a character that it would preclude the possibility of disposing of the whole question in the course of the present Session.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, he would ask the attention of the House only for a moment. He had to speak for the community chiefly interested in the navigation of the River Tay—the City of Perth—but as the House seemed to be agreed, he would confine himself to asking a question. He understood that it was proposed specially to charge the Committee with the important inquiry into the effects on the navigation of the river, as well as into the conditions of safety for the travelling public. He wished to ask his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, whether the result of that Instruction to the Committee would not be considerably to prolong the inquiry; and, if so, whether the expense of providing evidence should not fall upon the public rather than upon any single community that might be most interested in protecting the navigation?

MR. ANDERSON wished to put a question to his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. His right hon. Friend was aware that there were plans and specifications deposited in the Bill Office in connection with the present scheme, signed by Sir Thomas Bouch. He (Mr. Anderson) wanted to know, if the Reference suggested by the right hon. Gentleman was agreed to, the Committee to whom the question would be referred would be no longer bound by those plans, and would be no longer in any way pledged to Sir Thomas Bouch? If he could obtain an assurance from his right hon. Friend upon that point he would be perfectly ready to withdraw the Amendment he had moved.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN wished to point out to his hon. Friend (Mr. Anderson) that the Committee would not be bound by anything that might be brought before them, but would deal with the whole question as they might think fit. He was informed that the plans were not signed by Sir Thomas Bouch. He (Mr. Chamberlain) had not seen the plans himself; but that was the information he had received. Perhaps he might be allowed to answer the other question which had been put to him. Rather more time would undoubtedly be taken up by the Bill in consequence of the Reference he intended to move, than by an ordinary inquiry before a Private Bill Committee. On the other hand, he did not see any reason why the inquiry should not be brought to a close during the present Session. As regarded the other question which had been put to him, the Committee would certainly have the power to call for evidence upon any of the matters that were within the scope of the Reference.

MR. ANDERSON said, the plans were not signed by anybody; but the specifications were signed by Sir Thomas Bouch. He begged now, with the leave of the House, to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR remarked, that there was one matter in connection with this Tay Bridge Bill, in regard to which the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was somewhat ambiguous, and that was as to the expense of the inquiry. The question had been raised by the hon. Member for Perth, and it seemed to him that these Scotch Gentlemen were rather disposed to get hold of all they possibly could. Seeing that this Tay Bridge was a matter in which very wealthy Corporations and Railway Companies were interested, he thought that these wealthy Corporations and these wealthy Railway Companies ought to be able to bear the expense of the inquiry without an appeal to the charity of the British taxpayers.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House and Three by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to inquire and report as to whether the Tay Bridge should be rebuilt in its present position, or whether there is any other situation more suitable, having due regard to the safety of the travelling public and the convenience of the locality.

That their special attention be directed to the interests of the navigation, and that the height of the bridge shall be so fixed as not injuriously to interfere with the river navigation.

That they shall consider generally in what way any bridge that may be authorised should be constructed so as to secure its permanent safety.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Reports of the Court of Inquiry held by the direction of the Board of Trade, and also the Report of Mr. Rothery, on the Tay Bridge disaster, together with the evidence taken by that Court, be referred to the Committee."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he had an Amendment to move to the Resolution just moved by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. It was a very short one. It was—

"And that the Report of General Hutchinson to the Board of Trade, dated the 5th day March 1878, relative to the opening of the Tay Bridge for passenger traffic, be also referred to the Committee."

It appeared to him (Sir Alexander Gordon) most important that that document should be officially referred to the Committee by the House, as well as the Reports of Mr. Rothery and other Gentlemen, for it appeared that the accident had arisen in consequence of the deviation by the directors from the Orders of the House. He would read four lines of Clause 6 of the Act authorizing the construction of the Tay Bridge. It was as follows:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act or the deposited plans, the number and position of the piers of the bridge across the Tay, and the width and the height of the openings between the piers shall be such as shall be prescribed by the Board of Trade."

The accident had arisen in consequence of the deviation from the deposited plans approved by the House; and it was most important that the Committee about to examine the question should ascertain whether the Board of Trade did authorize that deviation from the plans or not. When a Private Bill was approved by Parliament, he thought it was their duty to see that their Orders were obeyed. The deviation from the plans in his case was the cause of the disaster; and unless the Committee had full power to go into the question it would be evaded and shirked altogether. In fact, the Board of Trade and their officers were quite as much on their trial as the Railway Company; and he hoped there would be a full and searching inquiry in the interests of the public. The Railway Inspectors of the Board of Trade constituted a Department, as the House well knew, which cost about £7,000 a-year; and it had been established simply for the purpose of guaranteeing the safety of these railways and bridges beforehand for public traffic, and it showed a serious defect in their arrangements that such a disaster could occur after a railway had been reported safe for public traffic by a gentleman appointed and paid for that special duty. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consent to add this to his Instruction, in order that the public safety might be properly secured in future.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Gentleman second the Amendment?

MR. BIGGAR begged leave to do so.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "and that the Report of General Hutchinson to the Board of Trade, dated the 5th day of March 1878, relative to the opening of the Tay Bridge for passenger traffic, be also referred to the Committee."—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he could not help thinking that the line chosen by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) was a little inconvenient. He (Mr. Chamberlain) thought that it would be altogether out of place in that inquiry to enter into a discussion of the operations of the Board of Trade and the conduct of its officers in connection with the Tay Bridge disaster. His hon. and gallant Friend had mistaken the scope of the inquiry to be conducted by the Committee. It was not to be a judicial Committee to decide who was to blame for the Tay Bridge disaster; but a Committee to decide engineering and commercial questions connected with the proposal for re-establishing that bridge. If he were to accept the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend it would be quite certain that they would not be able to conclude the inquiry that year. Under those circumstances, he must object to make the proposed addition.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that, by the leave of the House, he would withdraw the Amendment. He wished to explain that an hon. Friend on his right took off his hat to second the Amendment before the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) rose; but the Speaker did not happen to see him.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he quite approved of the course which had been adopted by the Board of Trade; but he wished to call attention to one clause of the Instruction which said that they should consider generally in what way any bridge that might be authorized should be constructed so as to insure its permanent safety. He thought that that was throwing upon the House the responsibility of the bridge in future; and he did not think that it was a responsibility that they ought to undertake.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Reports of the Court of Inquiry held by direction of the Board of Trade, and also the Report of Mr. Rothery, on the Tay Bridge disaster, together with the evidence taken by that Court, be referred to the Committee.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records, and that Four be the quorum of the Committee.

QUESTIONS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE WINE DUTIES.

MR. MAC IVER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to statements which have appeared in the newspapers to the effect that a movement has been set on foot in Germany for obtaining a "surtaxe d'entrepôt," whereby importations of foreign produce, viâ ports in Great Britain or Ireland, will be subjected to greater taxation than if imported direct; and, whether Her Majesty's Government has reason to believe that such a measure is in contemplation, and that we are likely to be placed at a disadvantage in trading with Germany unless the Duties upon German wines are reduced simultaneously with those upon French and Spanish wines? It was needless to ask the latter part of the Question, as he understood that it was the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to abandon the idea of reducing the duty on French and Spanish wines.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The statement of my right hon. Friend was, not that he entirely abandoned the intention of reducing the wine duties, but that he proposed to postpone the matter till the beginning of next Session. With respect to the Question, I have to say that a measure of this nature has been discussed in Germany; but it does not appear to have been brought before the German Legislature. The Commercial Treaty between this country and Germany contains the usual Most Favoured Nation Clause; and Her Majesty's Government do not, therefore, see how the trade between Great Britain and Germany could be placed at a disadvantage in relation to other foreign trade with that country.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland gave, in 1878, to the Galway Model School, £7 4s. for doing the same Government work for which it gave only £1 2s. 8d. to the King's Inn Street Schools; and, whether he will draw their attention to the facts and ask for an explanation?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he should refer the hon. Member to the answer he gave to the hon. Member for Kilkenny a few days since on that subject. It could not be said that the same amount of work was done in the King's Inn Street School as in the Model School, where pupil teachers were trained, causing additional expense, as they were, to some extent, boarded. The school referred to was a Convent school, and, he believed, a very good school; and the payment made was about a quarter what it would otherwise be, because the teachers would not present themselves for examination for certificates of classification.

INDIA—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

MR. BIRLEY asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he will inform the House on what day he will be prepared to submit to the House the Indian Financial Statement?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that in the present state of the Business of the House he was unable to name a day on which he could make the Financial Statement. He believed it was the intention of his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government, in the course of next week, to make a proposal which would place at the disposal of the Government a larger portion of the time of Parliament; and if that proposal was adopted, and the House in the meantime made progress with the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill, he hoped to be able to find time for making the Financial Statement before the end of the month.

RUSSIA AND CHINA—REPORTED HOSTILITIES.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If, having regard to the present relations between Russia and China, and the recent increase of the Russian Naval force in the China Seas, it is intended to strengthen the British Squadron in those waters?

MR. GLADSTONE: Perhaps I ought to say, in replying to the right hon. Gentleman, that we have not received any confirmation of the reported defeat of the Russian Forces by the Chinese, and that the reports of such alleged defeat are not believed, so far as we are able to understand, by the Diplomatic Representatives of either Russia or China in this country at the present time. If a war should unhappily break out between Russia and China, we should at once avail ourselves of an offer made by the Russian Government to enter into communications with us as to questions seriously affecting British interests in Chinese waters. The British Naval Force in Chinese waters is large at the present time; but the course of affairs will be closely watched by the Admiralty with a view to increasing it if necessary.

INDIA—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE.

MR. PUGH asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is the fact that the Government of India make an annual profit on the administration of justice in civil and revenue causes and matters; and, if so, whether he can state the approximate amount of such profit?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The actual cost of the administration of justice, civil and criminal, is about £2,294,000. The receipts of all kinds connected with the administration of justice are about £2,320,000; so that the profit referred to in the Question is about £26,000. It is impossible to distinguish the receipts and charges under the separate heads of criminal, civil, and revenue causes and matters, as, in general, the same Courts and establishments are employed upon both civil and criminal work, and Court fee stamps are used indifferently for all cases. It is, however, the case that civil justice pays for itself and for a large part of the cost of criminal justice.

MR. BRADLAUGH—COSTS OF LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

MR. NORWOOD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering that the Government have declined to introduce a Bill to amend the Law so as to remove doubts as to the legality of the affirmation taken by the junior Member for Northampton, Her Majesty's Government will, as an act of justice to the honourable Member and his constituents, instruct the Law Officers of the Crown to undertake his defence in any suit brought against him to test the validity of his affirmation?

MR. CALLAN wished, before the Question was answered, to ask the Prime Minister whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt the course which had been suggested by certain of the admirers of the junior Member for Northampton—namely, to remit all penalties that may be incurred by that Member; or if the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to state that the Government would allow the law to take its course?

MR. GLADSTONE: No application has been made to Her Majesty's Government by any admirer of the junior Member for Northampton with regard to the remission of penalties; and, therefore, I will pass by the Question of the hon. Member for Louth. My answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood) must be in the negative. We consider that any return of a Member made by any constituency of this country must necessarily be made, and understood by them to be made, subject to the conditions of the existing law. To ascertain the application of those conditions in any particular case is no part of the duty of the nation at large, or of the Government. With respect to any questions as to the alteration of the law, that is not to be considered with regard to the case or claim of the particular individual, but on the grounds of general policy, on which it will have to be decided by the House.

MR. BRADLAUGH asked the indulgence of the House to be allowed to say that the Question which had been put was made without any communication with himself. He had no doubt as to the legality of the Affirmation which he had made; and he had had no communication whatever, directly or indirectly, with the Government on the subject.

DISTRESS (IRELAND)—RELIEF WORKS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will state what progress has been made with the proposed public relief works in Lowfark, county Mayo, and in the baronies of Gallen and Costello generally; if any steps have been taken on the recommendation of Dr. Bourke, Local Government Board Inspector, and the paid guardians of the Swinford Union, to deepen the bed of the river at Charlestown; and, if he can state whether the fever has been checked in its progress in the various parts of Mayo where it has shown itself? I hope that the House will allow me to state that since I gave the Notice on the Paper which I have just read, I have received intelligence from both private and public sources that the fever is much more serious than I thought. The right hon. Gentleman will recollect that on Thursday I called his attention to the letter of the Bishop of Achonry on the subject, and I propose to add some information from him with regard to the want of a sufficient staff of workhouse officials in the West. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that owing to the insufficiency of the workhouse staff in that part of the country the parish priest of Charlestown had to undertake the duties of nurse and doctor as well as of clergyman, and had to carry out in his arms, in fever-stricken places, men into carts provided by the charity of himself and his neighbours to be conveyed to the workhouse; and, also, whether, in numerous sections of the country, no one could be found to act as undertakers for the interment of the poor except the nuns of the convent?

MR. FINIGAN: I beg to ask my Question at the same time. It is to ask the Chief Secretary, If his attention has been officially, or otherwise, called to a letter from the Right Reverend Dr. MacCormack, Bishop of Achonry, to His Grace the Most Reverend Dr. Cooke, Archbishop of Cashel, and published in the "Freeman's Journal" of the 6th inst., in which it is stated that fever is spreading in certain parts of Ireland; and, if so, is the Government prepared to at once send medical, or has it already sent assistance and special financial aid to the affected districts?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Mayo, I will first answer him as to the question of works. 58 works have been authorized in Gallen at an estimated cost of £4,311, of which £2,047 has been issued; 72 works have been authorized in Costello, at an estimated cost of £3,843, of which £3,036 has been issued; and nine of the works in the barony of Costello are in the parish of Kilbeagh, which appears to be the locality referred to as Lowfark, and the amount authorized to be expended on them is £692. Of this £315 has been issued. The Board of Guardians stated in May last that the sewage works at Charlestown could not be undertaken until an obstruction existing in the river in the County Sligo and Union of Tobercurry was first removed. The Vice Guardians and the dispensary medical officer concur in this opinion. With regard to the question as to the state of fever in these districts, we have ordered two special Medical Inspectors to go down to inquire into the subject, and they have gone down. I am expecting every day a Report with respect to Swinford and other parts of Mayo, and as soon as I get it I will give the information to the House. We have not only done that, but we have sent positive orders to the Guardians and to our Inspectors to see that no delay takes place in giving medical assistance or seeing what can be done to supply fresh food, or a change of food, or such food as is wanted to prevent the spread of fever, and any other steps it may be advisable to take. I have received rather more encouraging reports lately; but I have not got positive statements from Mayo which I might give to the House. I have had a report of the state of the fever in Dromore, in Sligo, which I will put on the Table of the House to-night, and it is encouraging to a considerable extent. The other Questions of the hon. Member for Mayo are of such a nature that I cannot answer them at once, and I would ask him to put them again.

ARMY—QUARTERMASTERS OF ARTILLERY.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If the subject of pay, promotion, and retirements of Quartermasters of the Royal Artillery is under his consideration; and, whether any and what measures are proposed to ameliorate the condition of these officers?

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary of State for War, If any steps are to be taken to remedy the grievances affecting the regimental Quartermasters of the Army; and, if so, whether he can state when such steps will be taken?

MR. CHILDERS: I have to say that the alleged grievances of the Quartermasters of the Line and of the Artillery form one of the very numerous questions which I found undecided by my Predecessors when I took Office. It has features of much difficulty and intricacy; but, considering the multitude of these questions and their relative importance, I cannot undertake to say when that of the Quartermasters will be ripe for settlement. It will receive in due time my best attention.

BRITISH BURMA—CONSUMPTION OF OPIUM.

MR. PEASE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received a Copy of a Memorandum forwarded in the Spring of this year by C. U. Aitchison, esquire, Chief Commissioner of British Burma, to the Government of India, on the consumption of opium in British Burma?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that the Paper in question had not been received by the India Office.

BOROUGH BOUNDARIES.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Government contemplate the introduction of a measure to facilitate the extension of Borough Boundaries for Municipal and Sanitary purposes; and, if not, whether the Government is willing to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject?

MR. DODSON: The matter is one of considerable difficulty, in consequence of the political considerations incidentally mixed up with it, and the Government have not yet had sufficient time to consider whether it would be practicable or desirable to effect an extension of borough boundaries, otherwise than by local Acts. At the same time, it is very desirable from a sanitary point of view that further facilities should be given for this purpose, and attention shall be given to the subject during the Recess. The information at present available will probably be found sufficient to enable the Government to arrive at a decision; and it does not, therefore, at present appear necessary to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the matter.

NAVY—NAVAL RESERVES.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether his attention has been called to the Report of Admiral Phillimore on the Naval Reserves. in which he states as follows :—

“The force (Coast Guard) on shore was meant in 1869 to be maintained at 4,300.

“On my relieving Sir W. Tarleton, in November 1876, the numbers short were 202. The numbers now short of this are 377, as, owing to the lack of candidates, the Vote taken this year was temporarily reduced by 150;”

To what does he attribute this “lack of candidates;” and, if it is the fact that the seamen of the Navy, from whose ranks these candidates are drawn, are in receipt of an increase of pay, in which the Coast Guard do not participate?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Question put to me by the hon. and gallant Member is almost identical with that which he put to me on Monday last. I am unable now to give a fuller reply to it without entering into a lengthened and detailed statement of the pay and position of the Coast Guard, which would scarcely be possible in reply to a Question. I would also put it to the hon. and gallant Member whether it is in the interest of the Public Service that a question should be raised as to the pay of a large body of men so soon after their numbers and pay have been voted by this House with the full concurrence of both Parties.

CAPTAIN PRICE said, that of the three courses that were open to an hon. Member when he regarded a reply to his Question evasive or unsatisfactory he had adopted that of repeating his Question on a future occasion. He wished to ask the Speaker whether, in the circumstances, he was not entitled to a categorical answer to his Question?

MR. SPEAKER observed, that after the hon. and gallant Gentleman had put his Question more than once, and had received replies to it, he himself had no power to interfere in the matter.

BURLAL ACTS—BATTERSEA BURIAL BOARD—CEMETERIES.

SIR HENRY PEEK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is aware that the proposal of the

Battersea Burial Board to purchase nearly forty acres of land near Wandsworth Common, in the parish of Wandsworth, has caused great consternation among the ratepayers, inasmuch as there are already seven cemeteries in or close to Wandsworth, and one on the borders of that parish for Battersea; that the establishment of another cemetery for a thickly populated parish would not only be prejudicial to a large amount of rateable property, but also in contravention to the intention of the Burial Acts; if he has been informed that the matter is strongly opposed by the ratepayers of Battersea on account of the large price to be paid for the land; if it be known that the land in question has a subsoil of clay; and, if he will be so good as to cause immediate and full inquiries to be made into the subject?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have already caused inquiry to be made in this matter. Dr. Hoffman, the Inspector of Burial Grounds, has made a Report to me, the conclusion of which is that he considers it his duty to recommend that the approval of the Secretary of State should not be given to the establishment of a cemetery on the proposed site, and I may say that the site will not be approved.

RESULT FEES.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that there are cases in which Result Fees awarded to Irish schools in March last have not yet been paid; and if so, whether he will take steps to prevent further delay in paying the sums overdue?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am informed that the number of cases in which result fees have not been paid amount to only 12 in the whole of Ireland. There are irregularities and difficulties connected with most of these cases, and the only one in which that is not the fact has been ordered to be paid.

AFGHANISTAN—RUMOURED
FIGHTING.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for India, If there is any truth in the statement in the Cabul

imperfections in the work turned out at the Wormit Foundry were due, in great part, to the want of proper supervision; that the supervision of the bridge after its completion was unsatisfactory; that, if by the loosening of the tie bars, the columns got out of shape, the mere introduction of packing pieces between the gibs and cotters would not bring them back to their positions; that trains were frequently run through the high girders at much higher speeds than at the rate of 25 miles an hour; that the fall of the bridge was probably due to the giving way of the cross-bracing and its fastenings. That the imperfections in the columns might also have contributed to the same result. These are the points, neither few nor unimportant, in which I concur with my colleagues."

"It seemed to me, also, that we ought not to shrink from the duty, however painful it might be, of saying with whom the responsibility for this casualty rests. My colleagues thought that this was not one of the questions that had been referred to us, and that our duty was simply to report the causes of, and the circumstances attending, the casualty. But I do not so read our instructions. I apprehend that if we think that blame attaches to anyone for this casualty, it is our duty to say so, and to say to whom it applies. I do not understand my colleagues to differ from me in thinking that the chief blame for this casualty rests with Sir Thomas Bouch; but they consider it is not for us to say so. The conclusion to which I have come is that this bridge was badly designed, badly constructed, and badly maintained, and that its downfall was due to inherent defects in the structure which must, sooner or later, have brought it down. For these defects, both in the design, the construction, and the maintenance, Sir Thomas Bouch is, in my opinion, mainly to blame. For the faults of design he is entirely responsible. For the faults of construction he is principally to blame, in not having exercised that supervision over the work which would have enabled him to detect and apply a remedy to them. And, for the faults of maintenance, he is also principally, if not entirely, to blame in having neglected to maintain such an inspection over the structure as its character imperatively demanded. I think, also, that Messrs. Hopkins, Gilkes & Co., are not free from blame for having allowed such grave irregularities to go on at the Wormit Foundry. Had competent men been appointed to superintend the work there, instead of its being left almost wholly in the hands of the foreman moulder, there can be little doubt that the columns would not have been sent out to the bridge with the serious defects which have been pointed out. The great object seems to have been to get through the work with as little delay as possible, without seeing whether it was properly and carefully executed or not. The Company also are, in my opinion, not wholly free from blame for having allowed the trains to run through the high girders at a speed greatly in excess of that which General Hutchinson had suggested as the extreme limit. They must or ought to have known, from the advertised time of running the trains, that the speed over the summit was more than at the rate of 25 miles an hour, and they should not have allowed it until they had satisfied themselves, which they seem to have taken no trouble to do, that the speed could be maintained without injury to the structure. It remains to inquire whether the Board of Trade are also to blame for having allowed the bridge to be opened for passenger traffic when they did. After what has come out in the course of this inquiry, it is clear that there can be no justification in future for disregarding altogether, as it seems to have been done, the effect of wind pressure on such a structure as this. But, whether General Hutchinson is or is not to blame for having so done, Sir Thomas Bouch is not relieved from his responsibility."

"Although this bridge, if properly constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications might, as we are told, have been capable of resisting a lateral pressure of from 60lbs. to 70lbs. per square foot, and a very much greater wind pressure than was probably brought to bear upon it on the evening of the 28th of December, it by no means follows that, constructed and maintained as we have seen it to have been, a very much lower pressure would not have sufficed to blow it down. With its conical bolt holes in the lugs and in the flanges of the 18-inch columns; with its lugs, shown by experiment to be unable to bear more than one third of the pressure due to their sectional areas; with the wind ties by which the columns were held in position loose, and with no effective supervision of these cast iron columns; and their attachments to see that they were doing their work properly; and with all these and the other defects to which we have called attention, can there be any doubt that what caused the overthrow of the bridge was the pressure of the wind acting upon a structure badly built and badly maintained?"

The Report, as he (Mr. Anderson) had said, was altogether of an unsatisfactory character to all parties concerned. It showed that the design of the bridge was bad, that the castings were bad—in fact, that everything connected with the bridge was defective. The blame was evidently mainly and principally due to the engineer for designing and constructing this wretched sham; but he had been knighted instead of being disgraced for building the miserable structure. The contractors were to blame for their inferior work, although they were driven to that by the inferior prices paid them; and the railway directors were to blame for paying inferior prices, and for having run trains over the bridge at a higher rate of speed than that recommended by

General Hutchinson. The hon. Gentleman was proceeding to make further quotations, when—

MR. DODDS rose to a point of Order. The question before the House was whether they should read a second time the North British Railway Bill. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) was making observations which seemed to him (Mr. Dodds) to be entirely addressed to the consideration of the Report which had been recently made public, and which might form a very proper subject of consideration in the House, but did not arise upon the question before them.

MR. ANDERSON said, that if the hon. Member for Stockton (Mr. Dodds) would wait a few minutes, he would see the bearing of the quotations.

MR. SPEAKER: The observations of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) are relevant to the subject matter before the House, and, therefore, they are quite in Order.

MR. ANDERSON said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dodds) would soon see the bearing of the quotations upon the new Bill that was proposed to be brought in. General Hutchinson said he would like to have an opportunity of observing the effect of a high wind upon the bridge while a train was passing over it. That was a very significant and a very prophetic statement, which showed that the danger was present in the mind of General Hutchinson, and yet General Hutchinson did nothing more than suggest it as a scientific theory; he did not seem to have attended to its probable effect on the safety of the public on whose behalf he was sent to inspect the bridge. He (Mr. Anderson) must now pass to the bearing of all this upon the new scheme. What the House had now to consider was whether, under the circumstances which he had narrated, it would allow the very same parties who were to blame to come before the House in the last month of the Session, and endeavour to rush through Parliament a Bill, not for the construction of a new bridge, with new plans, and under a new engineer, but for the patching up of this miserable broken structure. ["No, no!"] It was a simple fact, which hon. Members could satisfy themselves upon. He maintained that it was contemplated by the Bill to patch up the old bridge. He had examined the plans and specifications, and he found they were signed by Sir Thomas

Bouch. That was sufficient proof that what he said was correct. What happened to the bridge in December last was enough to show that the House ought not to intrust the same architect with its restoration. His reason for opposing the Bill was that there was not time for a Committee upstairs to sufficiently consider the difficulties they had before them in the matter. He did not regard the late disaster as an accident at all. The collapse of the bridge was a forgone conclusion; and yet the very same parties who built the bridge, who built it with such insufficient work, and with such insufficient care, now came before the House again, when some of them ought to be, he believed, standing in a criminal dock to answer for their neglect. He (Mr. Anderson) had been taunted that he was opposing the Bill in the interest of a rival Railway Company, and in the interest of the preference shareholders of the North British Railway Company, who did not approve of the Bill. He put his Notice of Opposition on the Paper after reading Mr. Rothery's Report, and before he had communicated with anybody on either side of the question. Since then he had been communicated with by both sides to a large extent. He had, however, nothing to do with all that. He had nothing to do with the interests of rival and contending railways; all he cared for in the matter was the safety of the travelling public, and it was that he imagined that the House had chiefly to care for. He thought the House ought not at that period of the Session to allow the Bill to go before a Private Committee, who could not possibly have time to consider the whole merits of the question. He begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he had some little difficulty in understanding the relevancy of a good deal of what his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had quoted from the Report on the Tay Bridge disaster to the Motion for the second reading of the locality referred to as Lowfark, and the amount authorized to be expended on them is £692. Of this £315 has been issued. The Board of Guardians stated in May last that the sewage works at Charlestown could not be undertaken until an obstruction existing in the river in the County Sligo and Union of Tobercurry was first removed. The Vice Guardians and the dispensary medical officer concur in this opinion. With regard to the question as to the state of fever in these districts, we have ordered two special Medical Inspectors to go down to inquire into the subject, and they have gone down. I am expecting every day a Report with respect to Swinford and other parts of Mayo, and as soon as I get it I will give the information to the House. We have not only done that, but we have sent positive orders to the Guardians and to our Inspectors to see that no delay takes place in giving medical assistance or seeing what can be done to supply fresh food, or a change of food, or such food as is wanted to prevent the spread of fever, and any other steps it may be advisable to take. I have received rather more encouraging reports lately; but I have not got positive statements from Mayo which I might give to the House. I have had a report of the state of the fever in Dromore, in Sligo, which I will put on the Table of the House to-night, and it is encouraging to a considerable extent. The other Questions of the hon. Member for Mayo are of such a nature that I cannot answer them at once, and I would ask him to put them again.

ARMY—QUARTERMASTERS OF ARTILLERY.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If the subject of pay, promotion, and retirements of Quartermasters of the Royal Artillery is under his consideration; and, whether any and what measures are proposed to ameliorate the condition of these officers?

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary of State for War, If any steps are to be taken to remedy the grievances affecting the regimental Quartermasters of the Army; and, if so, whether he can state when such steps will be taken?

MR. CHILDERS: I have to say that the alleged grievances of the Quartermasters of the Line and of the Artillery

form one of the very numerous questions which I found undecided by my Predecessors when I took Office. It has features of much difficulty and intricacy; but, considering the multitude of these questions and their relative importance, I cannot undertake to say when that of the Quartermasters will be ripe for settlement. It will receive in due time my best attention.

BRITISH BURMA—CONSUMPTION OF OPIUM.

MR. PEASE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has received a Copy of a Memorandum forwarded in the Spring of this year by C. U. Aitchison, esquire, Chief Commissioner of British Burma, to the Government of India, on the consumption of opium in British Burma?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that the Paper in question had not been received by the India Office.

BOROUGH BOUNDARIES.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Government contemplate the introduction of a measure to facilitate the extension of Borough Boundaries for Municipal and Sanitary purposes; and, if not, whether the Government is willing to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject?

MR. DODSON: The matter is one of considerable difficulty, in consequence of the political considerations incidentally mixed up with it, and the Government have not yet had sufficient time to consider whether it would be practicable or desirable to effect an extension of borough boundaries, otherwise than by local Acts. At the same time, it is very desirable from a sanitary point of view that further facilities should be given for this purpose, and attention shall be given to the subject during the Recess. The information at present available will probably be found sufficient to enable the Government to arrive at a decision; and it does not, therefore, at present appear necessary to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the matter.

APTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary of the Admiralty, Whether his attention had been called to the Report of Admiral Phillimore on the Naval Reserves. Which he states as follows:—

The force (Coast Guard) on shore was meant to be maintained at 4,300.

On my relieving Sir W. Tarleton, in November 1876, the numbers short were 202. The numbers now short of this are 377, as, owing to lack of candidates, the Vote taken this year was temporarily reduced by 150;”

What does he attribute this “lack of candidates;” and, if it is the fact that the seamen of the Navy, from the ranks these candidates are drawn, in receipt of an increase of pay, in which the Coast Guard do not participate?

R. SHAW LEFEVRE: The Question put to me by the hon. and gallant Member is almost identical with that which he put to me on Monday last. I am unable now to give a fuller reply to it without entering into a lengthened and detailed statement of the pay and position of the Coast Guard, which would not be possible in reply to a Question.

I would also put it to the hon. gallant Member whether it is in the interest of the Public Service that a provision should be raised as to the pay of a large body of men so soon after the numbers and pay have been voted by this House with the full concurrence of both Parties.

APTAIN PRICE said, that of the various courses that were open to an hon. Member when he regarded a reply to a Question evasive or unsatisfactory and adopted that of repeating his position on a future occasion. He added to ask the Speaker whether, in the circumstances, he was not entitled to a categorical answer to his Question.

S. SPEAKER observed, that after the hon. and gallant Gentleman had put the Question more than once, and had received replies to it, he himself had no right to interfere in the matter.

LOCAL ACTS—BATTERSEA BURIAL BOARD—CEMETERIES.

MR. HENRY PEEK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Is he aware that the proposal of the

Battersea Burial Board to purchase nearly forty acres of land near Wandsworth Common, in the parish of Wandsworth, has caused great consternation among the ratepayers, inasmuch as there are already seven cemeteries in or close to Wandsworth, and one on the borders of that parish for Battersea; that the establishment of another cemetery for a thickly populated parish would not only be prejudicial to a large amount of rateable property, but also in contravention to the intention of the Burial Acts; if he has been informed that the matter is strongly opposed by the ratepayers of Battersea on account of the large price to be paid for the land; if it be known that the land in question has a subsoil of clay; and, if he will be so good as to cause immediate and full inquiries to be made into the subject?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have already caused inquiry to be made in this matter. Dr. Hoffman, the Inspector of Burial Grounds, has made a Report to me, the conclusion of which is that he considers it his duty to recommend that the approval of the Secretary of State should not be given to the establishment of a cemetery on the proposed site, and I may say that the site will not be approved.

RESULT FEES.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that there are cases in which Result Fees awarded to Irish schools in March last have not yet been paid; and if so, whether he will take steps to prevent further delay in paying the sums overdue?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am informed that the number of cases in which result fees have not been paid amount to only 12 in the whole of Ireland. There are irregularities and difficulties connected with most of these cases, and the only one in which that is not the fact has been ordered to be paid.

FIGHTING.

correspondence of the "Times" of July 5th, viz: that, a gathering of tribesmen having taken place in a village, General Hills, formerly Governor of Cabul, despatched a cavalry brigade with orders to disperse them, and "to give the best account of them possible;" and that, on the approach of the cavalry, these people took to flight, but nevertheless they were pursued for six miles, and two hundred of them were killed; and, if the facts are at all as represented by the "Times" correspondent, whether there is not so much appearance that the officers concerned have acted in contravention of the orders of the Secretary of State prohibiting unnecessary and vindictive attacks on and slaughter of Afghans, as to render an immediate inquiry necessary?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I must point out, in the first place, to the hon. Gentleman that the extracts which he has read conveyed generally an accurate idea of what has taken place in the neighbourhood of Cabul. I am unwilling to take up the time of the House by reading very long documents in reply to the hon. Gentleman's Question; but when the character of our officers is attacked it is necessary that I should put the House in possession of the exact facts upon which the attack is founded. The account of the affair to which the hon. Gentleman refers is given in The Times of last Monday in the following words:—

"On learning that the Ghazni Field Force was returning from Char-Asiab towards this place on the 26th ult., the whole of the tribal gatherings which had collected in the Logar Valley with hostile intentions dispersed to Zurmat, Charwar, Maidan, and Wardak. The Logaris themselves had steadfastly refused to join them. Three days ago, however, the political officer, Colonel Euan Smith, learnt that under the influence of Sirdar Mahomed Hassan Khan, the late Governor of Jellalabad, the Zurmat men had again collected to the number of 800 or 900 at the large village of Padkhow, where they had been joined by the above Sirdar. It was further learnt that in this new movement Sirdars Hassim Khan and Abdullah Khan, whose flight from Cabul was noticed last week, had joined. These latter Sirdars had sent into Logar offering large rewards for men and arms, and requesting the people to assemble and await their arrival. They promised to bring a large following from the vicinity of Khoord Cabul, and stated that they would be joined by 12,000 men from Maidan. As the collection at Padkhow, therefore, seemed likely to become the nucleus of a large gathering, it was determined to break it up at once. Accordingly, General Hills ordered a cavalry brigade, under General Palliser, to reconnoitre early on the 1st inst. towards Padkhow, directing that officer, if he found the enemy, to give the best account of them possible. The brigade consisted of the 1st and 2nd Punjab Cavalry and the 19th Bengal Lancers. On arriving at Padkhow it was found that the enemy had taken flight. They were overtaken about three miles off, trying to reach the shelter of the hills. They numbered some 800, and had been deserted, as usual, by their leaders. When they found that escape was impossible, they stood at bay and died bravely. The pursuit was continued for six miles, and 200 of them were killed."

Thus, while the statement in The Times is that the gathering fled on the approach of the troops, the fact is that an engagement occurred before the enemy were broken. The telegram which I received on the 7th of July from the Viceroy of India gives a somewhat different account of the affair. It is as follows:—

"Yours, 6th. Facts about Padkhow fight as follow:—On 1st July General Hills hearing of gathering near his camp at Zargun Shahr, sent out Palliser with 550 cavalry to disperse it. Palliser found the enemy 1,500 strong near Padkhow. Our cavalry attacked and broke them, pursuing some miles, and killing over 200. Our loss, three killed, Captain Barrow and 24 men wounded. Enemy were Zurmatees. Stewart thinks fight will have excellent effect. Gatherings numerous and excited greatly by private letter of negotiation with Abdurrahman. It is necessary for military security and supply not to allow ourselves to be hemmed in, and Hills was right in dispersing the Zurmatees.

The House will see that it is impossible, as long as our Forces remain at Cabul, to permit armed gatherings of the Afghan Tribes of this kind to be held in the neighbourhood. Strict orders have been issued that no unnecessary military demonstrations should be made during the stay of our troops in Afghanistan.

CLEVELAND IRONWORKS, MIDDLESBOROUGH.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to an inquest held on the bodies of three men who were killed by a fall of staging at Cleveland Ironworks, Middlesborough, a report of which appeared in the "Northern Echo" on 2nd instant; if his notice has been directed to the fact that the coroner suggested to the jury—

"That they should not add any recommendation to their verdict as to the prevention of similar accidents in future. There were able men at the head of the firm of Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. who would take the matter into their consideration and devise whatever they could to prevent the recurrence of a similar accident in future ;”

whether it be true that the Coroner is himself a partner in the Linthorpe Ironworks, Solicitor to the firm of Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co., to Bell Brothers, and to many others of the Ironmakers near Middlesborough ; and, if it is customary that the legal representatives of large employers are appointed to act as coroners in the district where they may be situated, where they may be called upon to make inquiries relating to deaths that may take place at their own works, or at those they may frequently be called upon to represent in their professional character ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had received a communication from the Coroner, who stated that the report quoted in the Question of what he told the jury was inaccurate, as clearly appeared from the correct reports given by several other newspapers. What the Coroner really said was that no doubt the jury would recommend the manager of the firm of Bolckow, Vaughan & Co. to take steps to prevent the recurrence of such an accident ; but he advised them, instead of expressing an opinion as to the precise course to be adopted, to leave that to the able manager of the concern. A statement from the foreman of the jury fully confirmed this account of what the Coroner actually said. The Coroner denied that he was, directly or indirectly, interested in any of the works either as a partner or shareholder. That gentleman said he had been Coroner for many years, and no doubt as to his impartiality had ever yet been raised. Eminent solicitors were very often and very properly employed as Coroners ; indeed, they were the best men who could be found to fill the office. Of course, it constantly happened that when a person was the best solicitor in a neighbourhood he was employed by persons of all descriptions. No doubt in that sense this gentleman had been employed by individuals who required legal advice and assistance. He thought that the hon. Member's Question was founded on the inaccurate report given in a newspaper of what the Coroner said.

ARMY—THE ROYAL ARTILLERY AND ROYAL ENGINEERS.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of the Government to act on the Address of this House, during the Session of 1879, for the appointment of a Royal Commission on the grievances of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers ; and, if not, what steps have been or will be taken to inquire into those grievances ?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to state that when I took Office I found that, although the preliminary steps had been taken for the appointment of the Royal Commission for which an Address was voted by this House on March 14, 1879, 14 months had elapsed since that Address, and the arrangements for the Commission had not been completed. I may say that no answer had been returned to the Address, which had been carried by a majority of only one. Under these circumstances, I looked very carefully into the questions raised in the debate and in the Address itself ; and I have found that most of them were such as could be better dealt with by a Departmental Committee than by the more cumbrous machinery of a Royal Commission ; but that the most important question—that is to say, the circumstances under which Artillery and Engineer officers might be selected for commands or appointments on the General Staff—was a matter not so much for a Royal Commission or a Committee as for the Secretary of State on his responsibility. A Memorandum has been accordingly signed by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and approved by me in the following terms—

“ All appointments of general officers to districts at home or abroad, and all Army Staff appointments, will be equally open to officers of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers and to officers of all other branches of the Service.”

The Departmental Committee, which consists of Lord Morley, General Taylor, Colonel Sir John Stokes, R.E., Colonel Reilly, R. A., and Mr. Knox, is now making good progress.

TREATY OF BERLIN—THE BERLIN CONFERENCE—TURKEY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any communications have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and other Governments as to the employment of coercive measures towards Turkey in the event of that Power refusing to accept the recommendations of the Conference of Berlin; and, if so, whether such communications can be laid before Parliament; and, whether Her Majesty's Government, before entering into any engagements will, in the event of such measures being considered necessary, give due notice thereof to Parliament, if sitting at the time, or, in case of their being adopted during the recess, will summon Parliament to consider them?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think I need hardly remind the House that, setting apart exceptional cases, it is not usual to make announcements respecting events which are future and contingent, nor to enter into engagements with respect to such events, nor to determine, in concert with foreign Powers, beforehand, what course should be taken with regard to them. I have, therefore, no direct information to give to the hon. Member at this time on the three Questions he has put to me. I have only to say, Sir, that our policy continues to be to prosecute to the best of our ability the faithful execution and fulfilment of the conditions of the Treaty of Berlin, and to prosecute that policy in concert with the united Powers of Europe; that with respect to the gravest of the pressing questions now pending the Powers of Europe, as represented in Conference at Berlin, have in entire union arrived at a conclusion; that that conclusion, however, has not yet been formally presented to the Porte; that we have usually found that when there has been a real union between the Powers of Europe the Porte has wisely deferred to their judgment and adopted their conclusions; and that I do not think it would be just or respectful to the Porte that we should, under the existing circumstances, anticipate that that will not be the case, in answer to a Question which assumes that in the face of the conclusion unanimously arrived at by the Powers the Porte will be disposed to resist that conclusion. I do not think it would be consistent with deference or with justice to the Porte to foreshadow such an event. With reference to giving information to Parliament and obtaining its sanction, I am sure the hon. Gentleman will see that these are questions which do not admit of a determinate answer. We shall endeavour to be guided by the best precedents and the best understood rules of other times, and by a strict observance of public faith and a due regard to the sound and well-considered judgment of Europe.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF ARTHUR
GEORGE.

MR. PASSMORE EDWARDS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is correct, as reported in the papers, that, at the Cambridge Police Court yesterday a youth named Arthur George was convicted of stealing a rosebud from a garden in Madingley Road, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment without the option of a fine, the prisoner having received a recommendation to mercy from his undergraduate Sunday School teacher, who offered to pay any fine; and, if the statements are accurate, whether he will take the matter into his consideration with a view to a reduction of the punishment?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, no more serious responsibility attached to his Office than that which called upon him to interfere with the judgment of constituted tribunals. So much interference must be exercised with caution, so as not to shake the authority of the law or of those by whom it was administered. At the same time, he must say there could be no greater error in the administration of justice than to allow a measure of punishment to be passed beyond what public opinion would support. In the present case he had received a letter from the magistrates in reply to one by himself. From this it appeared that many complaints had been made of robberies from gardens near Cambridge, and consequently a police officer was set to watch them. The prisoner, Arthur George, was caught about 4 o'clock on Sunday morning, having twice come from his house with the intention, as the magistrate believed, of committing a depredation. He was 18 or 19 years old, and there was another conviction against him of wilful damage to a plate-glass window. In the circumstances, the magistrates thought it desirable to inflict serious punishment on the culprit. It was worthy of remark, however, that the statement received from the magistrates did not state under what statute they passed sentence, nor what sentence they, in fact, passed. He had called the attention of the magistrates to these important omissions in their Report. If the sentence were one of three months' hard labour, he must express his opinion that it was excessive and disproportionate to the offence. Considering, however, that the offence was committed with deliberation at 4 o'clock in the morning, it certainly deserved serious punishment. Still, to sentence a boy to three months' imprisonment with hard labour for an offence of this character was, in his opinion, more calculated to excite sympathy for the offender than condemnation of the offence. He should state his opinion to the magistrates, and take measures for a mitigation of the sentence.

4TH EAST YORK ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. NORWOOD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can now state the result of the inquiry held at Hull, on the 25th ultimo, into the proceedings of the 4th East York Artillery Volunteers on the 16th June last; and, whether he is prepared to institute a searching inquiry into all the circumstances which have led to the affair above referred to, in compliance with the request made to Her Majesty's Government, by a Resolution of the Hull Town Council at a special meeting?

MR. CHILDERS: Before answering this Question I may be allowed to correct an inaccuracy in the reply which I gave to a former Question on this subject. I said that in 1879 Colonel Saner and three other officers brought certain charges against Colonel Humphrey. Colonel Saner wrote to me as to this reply, and on looking into the Papers I am satisfied that he was not one of those who preferred the charges, but that he only forwarded them. In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that the result of the inquiry held at Hull on the 25th of June into the proceedings of the 16th of June was that Lord Londesborough, the hon. Colonel of the regiment, whose resignation was withdrawn at my request and that of the Commander-in-Chief, went to Hull and notified, on the 5th instant, to the corps the decision that Her Majesty dispensed with the services of Colonel Humphrey and three other officers. Lord Londesborough, from whom we are receiving every assistance, has been requested to recommend a new lieutenant-colonel commandant and other officers for the present vacancies. As to my hon. Friend's second Question, I do not clearly understand what inquiry the Town Council of Hull desire unless it be that I should review my Predecessor's decisions. That I am not prepared to do; but if, when the vacancies in the corps are filled up and matters are in a more settled state, my hon. Friend will move for the Papers I think I shall be able to give them.

LORD ELCHO said, he read in the newspapers that when these officers were dismissed as the result of the inquiry they were cheered by the men upon the breaking up of the meeting. That was a grave matter as regarded discipline, and he wished to know whether it was true.

MR. CHILDERS said, he should hesitate to answer that Question without Notice. He thought he had read in the newspapers something to the effect stated by the noble Lord; but it did not appear, if he remembered rightly, in the report of the officer from York who was present on that occasion, because, as he understood, the matter occurred after the officer had dismissed the corps. Considering the present condition of affairs, His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and himself did not think it necessary to institute an inquiry.

ORDER—EVICTIONS (IRELAND).

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON was about to put a Question on this subject, when—

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that he noticed in the terms of the Question something which referred to what had been stated in a previous debate this Session. If that were so the noble Lord could hardly be in Order in putting the Question, and he asked for the ruling of the Speaker on the subject.

MR. SPEAKER: I understand the object of the noble Lord's Question is to inquire whether a certain Return can be laid before the House. I do not observe in it any reference to a former debate. Any reference to what was said in a former debate this Session would be irregular.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can lay upon the Table of the House a tabulated Return of the landlords whom it is alleged have availed themselves of the present disastrous state of things to improve their estates, by adding farm to farm in order to grow sheep instead of men; such Return giving the number of farms cleared, and the increase in the value of each individual estate so consolidated.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am not aware of the allegation to which the Question refers having been made. It was not made by myself; and if it was made by any other Member of the Government perhaps it would have been better if the noble Lord had asked such Member. What I believe has been stated is this—that it is very desirable to prevent landlords from so availing themselves, and a Bill, of which probably the noble Lord is aware, has been brought forward for that purpose.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Am I to understand that any assertion or any allegation to the effect mentioned in my Question is based upon pure assumption if the right hon. Gentleman is not able to adduce any facts?

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: I would venture to ask the noble Lord, who was himself a Member of the late Administration, Does he mean to say that those allegations were made in this House by a Member of Her Majesty's Government this Session, because I have been informed by you, Sir, that to put such a Question would be exceedingly irregular? I now beg to ask him when and where and how the allegation was made?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I think the noble Lord is really asking me a Question which would ultimately lead to a debate. I endeavoured to give as clear an answer as I could. I demur to any assumption beyond the words I used. The Question would oblige me to refer to a past debate, and I cannot answer it without such reference.

MR. SPEAKER: It certainly does appear to me now, from the conversation which has taken place on this matter, that the Question put by the noble Lord does refer to a past debate of this Session. I am bound to say that any reference to what has been said in a past debate of this Session would be irregular.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that perhaps he might be allowed, as a matter of personal explanation, to state that he was quite ready to meet the noble Lord in debate upon the question.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—NOTTINGHAM ELECTION PETITION.

MR. A. BALFOUR asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Shorthand Writers' Notes of the Proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas relative to the withdrawal of the Nottingham Election Petition?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that the duty of the shorthand writer seemed to be confined to taking notes of the evidence and of the remarks of the Judges; but there were no notes in this case that could be laid on the Table.

GOVERNOR STRAHAN.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table a Copy of a Despatch dated November 16th, 1877, addressed by Lord Carnarvon to Governor Strahan?

MR. GRANT DUFF: No, Sir.

THE PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE CLOCK IN PALACE YARD.

MR. FORESTER asked the Chief Commissioner of Works, If he would state the expenditure incurred in repairing the face of the clock in the tower of Westminster Palace looking towards Buckingham Palace, and when there is any likelihood of its being finished?

MR. ADAM: The cost of executing the necessary repairs, painting and re-gilding the west face of the clock, the ironwork surrounding it, repairing the hands of the clock, the metal framework and the opal glass, has been about £240. The clock has been going since Saturday last, and the scaffolding is all down. These repairs are of a dangerous nature, and can only be undertaken during the summer months, and therefore, unfortunately, while the House is sitting. This is the first time the clock face has been cleaned since it was erected. A special scaffolding had to be designed and completed; and I cannot say that, considering the difficulty of the work, it has taken an unreasonable time to complete.

CIVIL SERVICE STORES.

MR. FINIGAN asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in the event of the Treasury issuing an order in accordance with the suggestions contained in his reply to the deputation on Civil Service Stores, it is intended to make such order apply to the Civil Servants who now use their leisure time in the management of these stores; and, if so, whether it is intended to compensate these gentlemen for the loss of a large portion of their incomes, they having infringed no existing regulation of the Service?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, he was still in correspondence with the members of the deputation of traders who saw him on the subject; and until that correspondence was completed he was unable to lay their wishes before the other Members of the Government or to make any statement as to the intentions of the Government in reference to the subject. But, speaking for himself, he must say he thought the active management by Civil servants on full pay of great commercial undertakings, though nominally confined to their leisure time, was not contemplated when the conditions of employment were settled; and he was of opinion that the acceptance of such responsibilities under the circumstances was exceedingly prejudicial to the public interest. He would not be inclined to recommend compensation if it were thought desirable to discourage such occupation.

MR. FINIGAN asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had given the opinion of the Government or only his own on the Question he had put?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN had stated distinctly that he expressed his personal opinion only.

ARMY—THE ROYAL WARRANT OF 1878.

MR. CHILDERS: I wish to appeal to the Chair and to the hon. and gallant Member for Clare (Captain O'Shea) on a matter which strictly has reference to the order and regularity of our proceedings. What happened was this—The hon. and gallant Member for Clare some days since put on the Paper a Notice of a Question to me, which was subsequently postponed till to-day. That Question involves a serious reflection on the action of one of the principal officers of the War Office, His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. The hon. and gallant Member does not now propose to put that Question at all, and he has asked you not to call upon him to put it. The point I wish to put to you, Sir, and to the hon. and gallant Member is this—Whether, after a Question of that kind has been placed on the Paper for so many days, after it has become the subject of discussion, I believe, in every newspaper of the country, having reference to a matter of so much interest, and involving the action of an officer of so much responsibility as the Commander-in-Chief, an opportunity should not be given for answering the Question?

Captain O'SHEA did not rise to put the Question.

MR. CHILDERS: If the House wishes it I will answer the Question.

CAPTAIN O'SHEA then rose and read the following Question which stood upon the Paper—

"To ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is in force an Article in the Royal Warrant of 1878 which lays down that a Lieutenant General who has been, for the convenience of the Service, appointed a General for the purposes of a Campaign, may, upon the special recommendation of the Commander in Chief, be confirmed in the rank he has so held if he has conducted himself to Her Majesty's satisfaction in the Field; whether any cases have recently occurred in which the above-mentioned recommendation has been withheld; and, if so, whether any minutes or statements have been made by the Commander in Chief of his reasons for withholding such recommendation; whether any inquiries have been made by him as to the grounds on which it has been withheld; and, whether he will state in what respect the officers unrecommended, if any, have been found to have acquitted themselves unsatisfactorily of their duties in the Field?"

MR. CHILDERS: I am glad the hon. and gallant Gentleman has put the Question, although I doubt whether it is expedient to put it at all, as it relates essentially to a matter concerning the discipline of the Army and promotion in the Army, as to which it is not customary to address the House of Commons. Under the Royal Warrant of 1854, a colonel, major general, or lieutenant general, who has been allowed the temporary rank of major general, lieutenant general, or general, as the case may be, for the purpose of a command, and who has held that command and conducted himself to Her Majesty's satisfaction for five years in time of peace, or for any shorter period in war, may, under the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, have his temporary rank made permanent. This provision was founded upon a recommendation of Lord Hardinge's Royal Commission, who advised that colonels only who had held the temporary rank of major general should be "entitled" to have it confirmed after the qualifying service. Lord Herbert, however, in framing the Warrant, struck out the word "entitled," and extended the provisions to major generals and lieutenant generals. This provision has been continued in subsequent Warrants. When the Warrant of 1877 was under discussion it was proposed to omit this provision altogether, for a reason which I am about to explain; but my Predecessor, Lord Cranbrook, allowed it to remain, only requiring that the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief should be "special;" and that word was accordingly introduced. The proposal to omit the provision altogether is intelligible when I inform the House that it has never been acted upon; for although officers holding temporary rank have sometimes been promoted to permanent rank, it has never been done under this clause. I find that since the provision first appeared in the Warrant of 1854 no less than 44 cases have occurred of officers of the ranks I have named having been allowed temporary rank for the convenience of the Service and for the purpose of a command. These cases include the names of Sir Hope Grant, who commanded in the last China War of 1860, Sir Duncan Cameron, and many others; but, as I have said, in no instance has the officer been promoted under this clause, although, in some cases, he was promoted afterwards, under Clause 49, for distinguished service in the field. In several cases distinguished officers have applied for the Commander-in-Chief's special recommendation to confirm the temporary rank; but it has been uniformly refused. Under these circumstances, the hon. and gallant Member will, I think, not require me to describe the grounds on which these recommendations have not been made during the last 26 years. I may, however, add that it has been suggested that the word "may" in the Warrant ought to have the meaning of "shall," and that the Warrant must be interpreted as if the word "entitled," deliberately struck out by Lord Herbert in 1854, were to be found there. This serious claim, reversing the decisions of my Predecessors during the last 26 years, is now under consideration; and I have thought it necessary to take careful legal advice on the subject before acting on my authority as interpreter of Royal Warrants.

MAINTENANCE OF MAIN ROADS.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, in consequence of Her Majesty's Ministers having had no opportunity of explaining their views on the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid-Somerset as to the cost of Main Roads, he can state whether the Government intends to propose any measure on the subject for the relief of owners and occupiers?

MR. DODSON: The Government have no intention of proposing any measure with regard to main roads during the present Session; but a Committee has been appointed by the House of Lords to inquire into the whole subject of highways, and they hope to have the advantage of seeing the Report of that Committee before determining what further legislation is necessary.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT— TEACHERS' CERTIFICATES.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in view of the continued complaints of teachers under the Educational Department in all parts of the country, the Department will in future, before suspending or cancelling any teacher's certificate, give the teacher against whom a charge is made an opportunity, either in person or by a representative, of learning the nature of such charge, and of making such explanations as may be necessary?

MR. MUNDELLA: On the 27th of May I stated fully, in reply to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), the practice of the Education Department in dealing with charges affecting teachers' certificates. I can assure the hon. and gallant Member that no certificate will be suspended or cancelled without the teacher being fully informed of the nature of the charge against him, and without the most ample opportunity being afforded him of replying thereto, and of making such explanations as he may deem necessary. I am not of opinion, however, that any good purpose would be served by personal explanations, and I am entirely opposed to the intervention of third parties.

NAVY—RE-ORGANIZATION OF THE MARINE CORPS—THE ROYAL MARINE ARTILLERY.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the case that recruiting for the Royal Marine Artillery has been stopped or considerably restricted, and for what reason; also, whether the Government will give honourable Members an opportunity of considering the Report of the Committee on the Reorganization of the Marine Corps during the present Session, and before coming to a decision on the subject?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The late Board of Admiralty, in November last, suspended recruiting for the corps of Marine Artillery, but not for the larger corps of Marine Infantry. Pending consideration of the questions affecting the general body of Marines, the present Board have not as yet resumed recruiting for the Artillery; but it must not be assumed from this that they have it in contemplation to abolish or extinguish this valuable and distinguished corps. With respect to the Departmental Report of the Committee, I must again repeat that I cannot say whether it will be laid on the Table of the House until the Admiralty have come to a decision upon the general questions now under their consideration affecting the whole corps of Marines.

SCIENCE AND ART—THE ROYAL SCHOOL OF MINES.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council for Education, When the Return relating to the removal of the School of Mines to South Kensington, ordered in March last, will be presented to the House?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that the Return was forwarded to the Home Office on the 2nd of July.

ARMY—HONORARY COLONELCIES.

MR. CHILDERS: I hope I shall receive the indulgence of the House in now answering a Question which I understood on Tuesday that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) told me that he intended to ask me after Notice, but which he subsequently explained that he had wished me to answer during the debate. The Question referred to details, and I manifestly could not reply to it without Notice. My hon. Friend wishes to know what honorary colonelcies of regiments are held by the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Connaught, and the Duke of Cambridge, and to which of them emoluments are attached. I find that the honorary colonelcy of the 10th Hussars is held by the Prince of Wales, and that the emoluments derived from it are £1,350 a-year; that the honorary colonelcy of the Grenadier Guards is held by the Duke of Cambridge, and that the emoluments are £2,200 a-year. All the other honorary colonelcies held by members of the Royal Family are purely honorary, and, in fact, the Duke of Connaught, when made Colonel-in-Chief of the Rifle Brigade, lost instead of gaining by the promotion. The Prince of Wales is Honorary Colonel of the Household Cavalry, and the Duke of Cambridge of the 17th Lancers, 60th Rifles, and the Ordnance Corps.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT—NEW WRIT FOR BERWICK-UPON-TWEED.

Order [6th July] read, for the issue of a New Writ for Berwick-upon-Tweed.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, that owing to an unexpected delay the necessary formalities had not been gone through in connection with the transference of one of the hon. Members for Berwick (Mr. Strutt) to the Upper House, in succession to Lord Belper. The Writ which had been moved for that borough had, therefore, been prematurely issued. He accordingly moved—

“That Mr. Speaker do issue his Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown to make out a supersedeas to the said Writ for the Election of a Member to serve, in the present Parliament, for the Town of Berwick-upon-Tweed.”

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the noble Lord would not be surprised if the House expected some explanation of his extraordinary, if not unprecedented, Motion. The seat became vacant only last week, and the Writ was moved for on Tuesday; but it now appeared that at that time the seat was not legally vacant. He wished to ask whether the usual steps were taken to ascertain whether a vacancy really existed; and what it was that influenced the noble Lord in moving for the Writ in such unusual haste? It was just possible that, in a town like Berwick-on-Tweed, it might be important to a party to have the election over with great speed. He was not going to make such a statement; but, at the same time, he would point out that various constructions might be put on the action of the noble Lord. At all events, the House ought to have some further information on the subject.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, that the facts were very simple. He had moved for the Writ a little too hastily, as he understood that when a vacancy occurred by the death of a Peer his eldest son immediately thereupon became ipso facto a Peer. He was not aware that certain formalities had to be gone through; and, if there had not been unexpected delay in this case, those formalities, which were very simple, would have been observed, and there would have been no occasion to move for the Writ of Supersedeas. He trusted that this explanation would be satisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

proposed to take at the Morning Sitting to-morrow and on Monday?

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked, Whether a time could be fixed for the second reading of the Burials Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Burials Bill would not be taken next week. The Business to-morrow would depend upon the course of the debate to-night on the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill. If it were not closed, it would be proceeded with to-morrow. If it were, then the adjourned debate on the Employers' Liability Bill would be taken.

Afterwards—

MR. GLADSTONE said, that since he had replied to the Question put to him as to the Business for to-morrow a communication had been made to him signifying a desire on the part of some hon. Members for a postponement of the adjourned debate on the Employers' Liability Bill. He had not had an opportunity of communicating with the President of the Local Government Board; and he would be excused, under the circumstances, if he withdrew the statement he had made with regard to the Employers' Liability Bill. He would, as soon as possible, fix a day for the renewal of the debate.

MR. KNOWLES hoped the adjourned debate would not be taken before Tuesday next.

QUESTIONS BY PRIVATE MEMBERS.

MR. J. COWEN said, they had now been employed close on two hours in asking Questions, and having been able to minute the time he could say that the reading of the Questions had occupied above an hour. He wished to ask Mr. Speaker if it was absolutely incumbent on hon. Members to read their Questions; because, if not, it would be a considerable saving of the time of House?

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the inquiry of the hon. Member, I have to state that there is no absolute rule on the matter to which he refers. It has been the general practice for many years for hon. Members in putting Questions to read those Questions, and it has been generally found to be a convenient course. There is, however, as I have said, no rule on the subject.

COMPENSATION FOR DISTURBANCE (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, as much misconception existed as to the area over which it was proposed that the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill would be operative, he would place in the Tea Room of the House a coloured map showing the extent of that area as compared with the rest of Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that having received from the hon. Member private Notice of the Question, he had asked for a map such as he had referred to. He might add that, as four Unions had been scheduled to parts of which only the Bill would apply, he would have to move an Amendment confining the operation of the Bill to those parts of the Unions in question. He could not say whether the map would be ready before the Bill was proceeded with in Committee.

LORD ELCHO hoped the map would be so shaded as to show the degree in which distress existed in Ireland.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. William Edward Forster, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. W. E. Forster.)

MR. PELL said, it would be necessary for him to refer to the principle of the Bill, and to state his reasons for placing on the Paper an Amendment which stood in his name—namely,

"That this House considers that the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill should be limited to the case of tenants on properties where evictions have taken place since November 1st, 1879."

The practical effect of the Land Act of 1870 was to give compensation to the tenant for disturbance in all cases except the non-payment of rent. The present Bill, however, did not seek merely to qualify that principle; it constituted an entirely new departure in legislation with respect to land in Ireland. The tenant who from any cause did not pay rent was still to regard himself as having property or interest in the soil, in respect to which he was entitled to compensation from the landlord if evicted. At this stage he would not have proposed to discuss the Bill itself at any length; but an Amendment had been given Notice of by the Attorney General for Ireland which completely altered its character, and that circumstance would be his excuse for making, on the present occasion, what he might term a second reading speech.

THE O'DONOGHUE rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member was in Order in referring to an Amendment put down for Committee before the Bill had reached that stage?

MR. SPEAKER understood the hon. Member was merely referring to the Amendment in the course of his observations, and not discussing it on its merits.

MR. PELL, resuming, proceeded to discuss the considerations which had been advanced in justification of the Bill. These were, chiefly, a scarcity of food in Ireland—not unparalleled, for in 1847 matters to his knowledge were much worse—and an inability on the part of a number of tenants to pay rent. There were other circumstances, however, which might have had something to do with the introduction of the Bill, but which had not been stated. They might, he supposed, take it for granted that there was, on the part of certain tenants, an inability to pay rent. At the same time, they could not shut their eyes to the fact that there was in the country a very general disinclination to do so. How far the expression of that disinclination had reached the ears and affected the minds of Ministers it was not for him to say; but perhaps he should not be far wrong in describing the Bill as having sprung from the unfortunate combination of a short crop of potatoes, and a strong and pronounced disinclination on the part of the people of Ireland to do what was right and honest by their landlords. Certain limitations had been set upon the operation of the Bill as to time and locality. He was about to propose another, which he trusted the House would not regard as uncalled for. The Prime Minister had spoken of the landlord in Ireland as the natural head and protector of the tenant, and had said that the bad landlords were a mere handful in number. That being so, was it quite fair, he would ask, to tar them all with the same brush—to subject them without distinction to conditions which were almost penal in their character? The House had heard something that evening about a map which was to be produced; but he wished it could be made to show not only those districts where the crops failed, but also where the existence of bad landlords was proved by continued evictions. As for the Bill itself, there was no sufficient ground for calling the circumstances which it had been introduced to meet exceptional. Those circumstances were, as a matter of fact, the result of depending upon the potato crop, which, as a means of sustenance, was becoming more unreliable from year to year. The Government, therefore, in regarding the circumstances as temporary, would, he was afraid, find themselves grievously disappointed. The object of his Amendment, he might add, was to limit the operation of the Bill, and to confine it, as far as possible, to the cases of those landlords whose action had been such as at all times to justify the introduction of such a measure. If the Bill passed in its present shape it would have a penal effect, and would place the good landlords in an unfair and uncomfortable position in regard to their tenants. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House considers that the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill should be limited to the case of tenants on properties where evictions have taken place since the 1st day of November 1879,"—(Mr. Pell),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. A. GREY: Sir, however painful it may be to me to take part in this debate, now that it has been conceded in every part of this House that the principle of the Bill under consideration is the principle of the Bill which has been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), I do not think it would be possible for me, after I have given Notice of my intention to move the rejection of that Bill, to remain altogether silent upon this occasion. Were I so to do, I would give hon. Members the right to infer that I had not the courage of my convictions, and that my action would not be consistent with the opinions which I hold, or with the principles upon which my conduct in this House should ever be regulated. It is to me a matter of the deepest regret that I should have been compelled, by the vote which I gave against the second reading of this Bill, to have opposed a measure introduced by Her Majesty's Government, to which I feel bound by the closest ties of allegiance and of association, and of which I am proud to consider myself an humble Supporter. The same reasons which led me from the first to entertain the strongest objection to the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo, also determined me to vote against the second reading of this Bill. I confess that I consider the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) is open to serious objection, inasmuch as it involves, although in a limited degree, the principle which is contained in the Ministerial measure. Three arguments have been advanced in favour of the proposal now under the consideration of this House. 1st, That it is the natural extension of the Land Act; 2nd, That it is a temporary measure, limited in its operation both as to time and area; 3rd, That it is desirable, even a necessity, in the interests of the Irish people, that this measure should be passed, and speedily passed, into law. I confess, that although I have listened with the closest attention to the speeches which have been delivered in defence of this Bill, I am not yet convinced that the principle which is common both to the Ministerial measure and to that of the hon. Member for Mayo is contained in the Land Act; but, on the contrary, I believe that it is directly opposed to the provisions of that measure, and that it is also in direct violation of those emphatic assurances and those express conditions under which that measure was suffered to become law.

MR. HOWARD rose to Order. He wished to know whether it was competent for the hon. Member at that stage to discuss the principles of the Bill?

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member was in Order.

MR. A. GREY resumed: The argument by which it is endeavoured to prove that this measure is but a slight development of the Land Act is based upon the consideration of Section 9 of the Land Act in the form in which it left this House as Clause 8, and also upon the consideration of Section 18 in the form in which it stands upon the Statute Book. It is said that because under Clause 8, as it left the Commons, the Court was empowered, on special grounds being shown, to declare in the case of tenancies existing before the passing of the Act, and in the case of such tenancies only, that eviction for non-payment of rent should be disturbance by act of landlord, that it would be but a slight and natural extension of this clause to give the Court similar powers in the case of tenancies created after the passing of that Act. And again, because under Section 18, where the landlord, on the determination of a tenancy, may wish to impose upon his tenant new terms to which the tenant will not accede, the Court has power to decide whether the proposed terms are just and reasonable, or whether the tenant has reasonably refused unreasonable terms, it is contended that it would be but a small amplification of this principle if power should also be granted to the Court, not only to decide, as at present, whether the terms of a new contract not entered upon are just and reasonable, but whether it is just and reasonable that a tenant should fulfil the terms of a contract into which he has already deliberately entered. The argument, therefore, is shortly this. Because the Court would have had under Clause 8 as it left the Commons, certain power in the case of tenancies existing before the passing of the Act, it should have the same power in the case of tenancies created after the passing of the Act; and, again, because the Court now, under Section 18, has power to interfere with proposed contracts, it should have similar power to interfere with established contracts. We have been frequently reminded that Clause 8, as it left the Commons, contained a provision by which the Court was empowered to declare in the case of certain tenancies, on special grounds being shown, that eviction for non-payment of rent should be disturbance by act of landlord; but we have not been so frequently reminded of the fact that this provision, on which so much stress has been laid, was by way of exception to the general rule of that same clause—a rule which it was the declared intention of Her Majesty's Government of 1870 to embody in the law as a part of its permanent provisions—to the effect that eviction for non-payment of rent should not be disturbance by act of landlord. Sir, the policy and reason of this exception become manifest when it is admitted that contracts entered into by the tenants before the passing of the Land Act of 1870 were made under circumstances unfavourable to the tenant, and before he was protected by the security which has since been afforded to him by the provisions of the Land Act. But once the Act had been passed, and the tenant had been relieved from conditions which were both unfair and inequitable, it was provided that he must, for the future, be absolutely responsible for the rent which he agreed to pay; and, accordingly, the Land Act, in every stage of its existence, in the form in which it left this House, in the form in which it came down from "another place," and in the form in which it stands upon the Statute Book, contained an express and unqualified declaration that in the case of every tenancy created after the passing of that Act, without any exception whatsoever, eviction for non-payment of rent should not be disturbance by act of landlord. This was, I admit, an exception to the general rule that eviction should be disturbance by act of landlord; but it was an exception so important that it is fairly entitled to be treated as one of the cardinal principles of the Land Act, and one of the chief conditions upon which that measure was passed into law. Well, Sir, I may be told that this is but my opinion, and that I am not warranted in this conclusion. That I am warranted in this conclusion must, I think, be admitted, when I show the House upon what authority I have based my opinion. For, Sir, I am supported in my contention by the Prime Minister, who, in the clearest language—which has already been quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand), and my hon. Friend the Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote)—declared what was the principle of the Land Act while it was still in its progress through Parliament, and who, in the speech which he made on moving for leave to introduce the Land Bill, more than once insisted upon the fact that, from the moment the measure passed into law, every Irishman, small and great, must be absolutely responsible for every contract into which he might enter—doctrines, Sir, embodying principles as to the sanctity of contracts which I have always been taught to respect, and to which I endeavoured to point the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite when I had the honour of moving the Address in reply to the most gracious Speech from the Throne. I have also the exposition of these principles, after the measure had become law, by one of the ablest lawyers who ever sat in this House. I allude to the late Mr. Isaac Butt, the brilliant and the distinguished Leader of that Party to which my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo belongs. Mr. Butt, in his book upon the Irish Land Act, at page 45, says—

“The rule which is to be permanently embodied in the law is stated in that portion of the 9th section which enacts that, for the purposes of this Act, ejectment for non-payment of rent shall not be deemed disturbance by act of landlord.”

And now, Sir, with this quotation in my hand, I ask you whether I am not justified in the opinion which I have stated? How can I support this opinion on higher or better authority? But if, notwithstanding all these reasons, it be said that this Bill is merely declaratory of the principle contained in the Land Act, I would ask the House to consider for one moment what must have been present to the mind of my hon. Friend the Member for Mayo, and those who act with him, when they proceeded to draft that Bill of which, when it comes up for discussion, I intend to move the rejection. How did they approach the subject? Did they propose to enlarge the Land Act by declaratory provisions? No, Sir. Let me quote from Clause 1 of the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo—

“From the passing of this Act so much of Section 9 of the Act of 33rd and 34th years of Her Majesty, c. 46, as provides that ejectment for non-payment of rent shall not be deemed disturbance by act of landlord, shall be repealed.”

Why does the hon. Member for Mayo

seek to repeat so much of Section 9 as was described by Mr. Butt as a rule which was to be permanently embodied in the law? Surely not because the provisions he was about to enact were declaratory; but because they were so directly at variance with the principles and language of the Land Act that, in order to give them due effect, and as a condition precedent, it was necessary to repeal that provision of the Land Act which was directly contrary to the provision of his Bill, and inconsistent with the object which he desired to accomplish. And, in this respect, I must confess that the Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo seems to me to be even preferable to that of Her Majesty's Government; for while that hon. Member frankly admitted that the principles of his Bill were contrary to the Land Act by repealing that part of the Act which was inconsistent with the objects sought to be attained by his Bill, the Ministerial measure is so framed, and, as we have been told, advisedly so framed, as to make it appear that Her Majesty's Government do not seek to do anything contrary to the Land Act, but only desire to declare its meaning in certain cases; while the meaning they thus seek by a declaration to give to the Land Act is not only contrary to the provisions of that Act, but is also in direct opposition to the principles upon which it was based, to the avowed intentions of its distinguished author, and to the repeated and emphatic assurances of those of Her Majesty's Ministers to whose care and labour was intrusted the passing of that Act. It is further contended that this measure is only an extension of the Land Act, because, under the Land Act, in those cases where there is a determination of a tenancy, and the tenant refuses to accede to the terms of a new contract as proposed by the landlord, the Court has the power of deciding whether the new terms are just and reasonable. Therefore, it is argued that as the Courts have the power to decide whether a new rent is just and reasonable, that they should have the same power as to old rents. But the two cases are absolutely different. For while it may be reasonable for the Court to approve conditions upon which a landlord may be willing to enter upon a new contract with his tenant, it is entirely contrary to reason to allow the Court to interfere so as practically to annul or modify the terms of a contract deliberately entered into, made, and agreed upon between two contracting parties. For what does such a proposition imply? It means that there shall be embodied in our law, as a part of our legislation, a provision by which men shall be told that there shall be an authority always existing—for I do not see how, after the arguments that have been used by Ministers in support of this Bill, this measure can remain either temporary or local—that there shall be an authority always existing ready to release men from contracts into which they have deliberately entered—a plan which, as we were told in words of solemn warning by the Prime Minister in 1870, would be more calculated than anything else—

“1st, for throwing into confusion the whole economical arrangement of the country; 2ndly, for driving out of the field all solvent and honest men who might be bidders for farms and might desire to carry on the honourable business of agriculture; and, 3rdly, for carrying widespread demoralization throughout the whole mass of the Irish people.”

I do not think it would be possible to describe in language more forcible the consequences that would be likely to ensue if such a proposition as this were suffered to become law. And now, Sir, as to the second reason—the limited scope of the Bill. This, of course is manifest. Its language is plain. But I fail to see how you can secure the limitation of a measure which is asserted by its supporters to be based upon true principles, upon principles which we are told existed in the Civil Law of Rome, and which have been adopted by the Codes of other countries. If this be true, and if, as Her Majesty's Ministers contend, this Bill is but an extension of the Land Act, how can they resist the demands of hon. Members opposite that the Ministerial measure shall be made permanent and universal? If it be the case that this measure is only an exception to a law which was passed behind the back, almost in fraud of the Irish tenant, that it is based upon principles which are just, principles which it is declared have been sanctioned by a former Parliament, I do not understand the reasons which have induced the Government to limit the operations of their Bill, nor do I understand why Her Ma-

esty's Ministers should take such especial pains to prove that it has only been introduced because of the exceptional circumstances existing in certain parts of Ireland. But, if it be the case that this Bill is not based upon those principles which should govern our legislation; but that this is an exceptional measure, introduced for the purpose of meeting exceptional circumstances, then, Sir, I equally fail to understand why Her Majesty's Ministers support it on general grounds. How, after such an admission as this, can they resist its extension to all parts of Ireland, its continuance to all time? The fact of this measure being limited, when it is supported by such arguments as these is, therefore, no recommendation to me, and can be none, I hope, to the House. But, Sir, after all, this is not a question how far this measure may be a logical and legitimate extension of a former Act, which I deny that it is. The real question before the House is, whether the condition of Ireland is such as to require the passing of such a measure as is here proposed. I do not think that anyone can sit in this House and hear the statements that are made by the Representatives from Ireland, without feeling acutely for the Irish people in their distress, and without extending to them his widest and most heartfelt sympathy. It is impossible that anyone who heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, can fail to have appreciated and to have admired the earnest and almost painful desire which he showed to extend to the Irish people whatever in his opinion might be just and right; nor do I think it possible that anyone could have heard that speech without being struck by the intense difficulty of the position of Her Majesty's Government—a position in which they require to be sustained by the kind and indulgent sympathy of the House. But, Sir, while the least impressionable among us must have frequently, in the course of this debate, felt his desire to bring relief to the suffering and distressed both strengthened and increased, none the less is it our duty closely to examine the proposals of this measure, so that we may see whether they are likely to accomplish that object which we all so greatly desire to obtain. If the State is to interfere to protect a tenant from the consequences that would naturally ensue from his non-fulfilment of the term of a contract into which he has deliberately entered with his landlord, in consequence of certain alleged exceptional circumstances, but not in consequence of any action of his landlord, where is the action of the State to cease when these exceptional circumstances affect the whole community? If you relieve the tenant in consequence of such exceptional circumstances, by rendering the landlord liable to pay him compensation when he requires the fulfilment of his contract, can you stop when you have done so? Must you not go further, and compensate the labourer if disturbed in his employment in consequence of the inability of the landowner to find means to pay him his daily wages by reason of the non-payment of that rent which, by the operation of this Bill, will be withheld from him? Must you not go further still, and compensate the unhappy landowner, when he is disturbed in the possession of his property by the mortgagee who will not consent to wait until 1882 for the payment of that interest which is due to him—and who, heedless of the condition of the landowner, forces a sale at a loss which may not only be ruinous to him, but to all of those helpless persons who are entirely dependent upon him, perhaps his widowed mother and his infant brother and sister? Must you not go further, and compensate the mortgagee who may himself be disturbed by proceedings in bankruptcy in consequence of his inability to meet engagements honestly entered into with his creditors on the faith of the income arising from money invested in first mortgages upon Irish land? Must you not go further, and compensate those very creditors? Must you not, in short, if you once depart from those principles which should govern your legislation, extend this State interference into every relation of life and to every form of contract? If so, then farewell to progress, to commerce, aye, to civilization itself; for, when once you encroach upon the sanctity of contracts, you shake the very foundations of society. For, Sir, the maintenance of contract is, after all, the maintenance of civilization; and, in the words of a distinguished leader of modern thought—

“The maintenance of contract is the maintenance of the fundamental principle of all life under the form given to it by social arrangements.”

Mr. A. Grey

I have waited, Sir, in vain for some explanation from Her Majesty's Ministers on this point; but the difficulty has not yet been faced. We have not been told how, if this Bill is passed, the landlord who receives no rent is to pay the interest on his mortgages. The Prime Minister did make one remark upon the question of mortgages; but that remark did not, I confess, remove my apprehensions as to what may be the probable consequences of this Bill. He maintained that the argument, by which it was endeavoured to show that the result of the passing of this Bill into law would be to prevent capital being invested in Irish land in the shape of mortgages, could not be considered as a valid argument against the Bill, because, so long as 50 years ago, it was the invariable practice of English solicitors to exclude Ireland as a place of investment for moneys bequeathed by testament to be laid out on mortgages. But the question to which I wish to direct the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers at present is not whether that capital which is so much desired may be attracted to Ireland, or whether a bad security is likely to be made worse. The question which I think has not been sufficiently considered is, what do you propose to do, if it can be shown that the direct consequences of the passing of this Bill will be to bring suffering and distress upon people living in all parts of the United Kingdom who have been guilty of committing no greater error than trusting for the security of their property to the protection which has been promised them by the law? Another argument that has been brought forward in defence of this Bill is, that the Irish tenant, as compared with the English tenant, is under great disadvantages. Sir, I hold in my hand the Report of a Royal Commission—the English and Irish Law and Chancery Commission of 1863—a Commission which included among its Members the respected names of Lord Cairns, Lord O'Hagan, and Lord Selborne. I will, with the permission of the House, read from the Report itself what are the differences between the law in England and Ireland with reference to ejectment for non-payment of rent—

“The differences between the law in force in the two countries in reference to the cases in which an ejectment for non-payment of rent

"In England—1. The ejectment must be between 'landlord and tenant,' and these words would not, it seems, include all the cases included by the Irish Act.

"2. One half-year's rent must be due when the writ is sued out.

"3. There must be no sufficient distress to be found on the premises countervailing all the arrears due.

"4. The landlord or lessor to whom the arrears are due must have a right by law to re-enter. He can have no such right except by virtue of some express condition or proviso for re-entry contained in the lease or agreement, or verbal letting.

"In Ireland—1. The existence of the relation of landlord and tenant in point of tenure is not necessary, provided a tenancy between the parties shall appear to exist, whether by original contract or by lawful assignment, devise, bequest, or act and operation of law.

"2. A year's rent must be due after deducting all just debts due by the landlord to the tenant at the time when the writ is sued out.

"3. The existence of a distress on the demised premises is immaterial with reference to the right to maintain the ejectment.

"4. An original right of re-entry compounded under the contract of tenancy is unnecessary, and its existence at the time of the commencement of the action in respect of the rent due is immaterial."

Sir, I am no lawyer; but I do not think it requires a specially legal training to find out, on the authority of this Commission, that the position of the Irish tenant is more advantageous than that of the English tenant in these two important particulars—first, that while in England a landlord must distrain upon a tenant before he brings the ejectment, in Ireland he need not do so; and, secondly, that while in England a writ of ejectment can be sued out when one half-year's rent is owing, in Ireland it cannot be sued out until one whole year's rent is due. I have pointed out shortly, but I hope not unfairly, some, but by no means all, the reasons why this Bill should not be allowed to pass. It is to me painful beyond description to oppose any measure which has for its avowed object the relief of that distress in Ireland which I so deeply deplore; but I feel bound to do so for the reasons which I have stated, and because I believe such a measure as this would be fatal to the true interests of Ireland, and because I am convinced that the inevitable consequences of the passing of this measure would be a state of things worse than that which we now seek to remedy. I believe that the effects of this measure would be injurious, insomuch as they would tend to discourage the habits of thrift, by placing a premium on improvidence and bad husbandry, and by making insolvency no longer discreditable but rather advantageous. I believe, farther, that the influence which the passing of this measure would have upon the national character of the Irish would not be for the good of Ireland. It seems to me that what is really wanted to improve the condition of the Irish people is to teach them to rely upon their own exertions, and not upon the State, and to look to the State as the enforcer of the law and not as the dispenser of relief. But, while pointing out what appear to me to be some of the grave objections to the passing of this Bill, I would venture, as an earnest of the kindly sympathy which I entertain towards the poor tenantry of Ireland in their wants and in their sufferings, and as an earnest of my desire that their rights of property should be efficiently secured to them—I would venture, if I might do so, to suggest to Her Majesty's Ministers whether or no there may not be other means by which they might obtain an object at once so desirable and so merciful; whether or no it would not be possible to approach tenants in their extremity upon terms that would be welcomed by them, that would be justified by the peculiar circumstances of their condition, and which would do violence to none of those cardinal principles upon which alone civil society can depend for its existence. A national calamity has overtaken the Irish people. The question is, how shall that relief be administered which the House asserts should be extended to the distressed tenantry of Ireland? We have been told that it would be admitting a doctrine of a most dangerous character if we sought to relieve a class which had been afflicted by a visitation of God out of the funds of the whole country. We were told that Parliament frequently made use of its power, in the interests of the public good, to take property from class A and to transfer it to class B. Precedents were brought forward to prove that Parliament had, in several instances, affirmed the justice of this principle; but, in every instance which the Prime Minister quoted, the evils sought to be remedied had in no case arisen out of a visitation of God. They had in every case arisen out of the faulty arrangements of man. I must confess, although I say it with all deference and respect, that while there may be objection, and great objection, to relieving a class which have suffered by the visitation of God out of the pockets of the State, it does appear to me to be admitting a doctrine of far greater danger, and one which can be, perhaps, used to justify acts of a revolutionary character, if you say that Parliament is only exercising its proper functions when, in consequence of an act of God, you take away the property of one class and transfer it to another, without granting any compensation in return. A national calamity has overtaken the Irish people. Should its effects be not met by a common effort, by a common sacrifice, on the part of all classes of the community, proportionate to their several capacities? Why should the landowners alone be saddled with penalties and weighed down by obligations? Cannot Her Majesty's Ministers devise some means, some plan, by which, at all events, they may meet out to the landowners the benefits of that equal treatment which the Prime Minister, the other evening, during the debate which took place on the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson), exhorted the House to extend to the publicans, whom he admitted were no favoured objects of the State? And I would ask, even at this hour, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whether, in an attempt to relieve distress, and in an endeavour to prevent the tenant from losing, owing to the exceptional badness of the seasons, that property which was created in his holding by the Act of 1870, subject always to the prompt and punctual payment of his rent, there may not be other means available, means quite as efficacious as those proposed by Her Majesty's Ministers, while they are in no degree subversive of those rights of property which it is the special function of this House to guard?

MR. PARNELL said, that the hon. Member for South Northumberland was not the first member of the ancient house of Grey who had done good service to the enemies of popular rights and progress by attacking from the Liberal ranks measures designed for the advancement of the Liberal cause. He regretted that the hon. Member, on almost his first appearance, should have undertaken to defend a system which all careful observers admitted to have been the proximate cause of Irish famines ever since they had a land system. He did not, however, propose to follow the hon. Member in his able arguments against the Bill, because he thought that on this occasion he had been flogging a dead horse, and that the task he had undertaken, in view of what had happened since yesterday morning, was a work of supererogation. Up to yesterday morning he (Mr. Parnell) intended to vote for the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair on the Committee stage of the Bill; but an Amendment on the Paper yesterday, under the name of the Attorney General for Ireland, had entirely changed his mind, and he could not now take the responsibility of voting or wasting the time of the House upon consideration of a measure which, if the intentions of the Government were carried out, as, of course, they would be supported with their large majority, would simply result in the passing of a useless measure. He would have voted for the Bill as it was printed. He understood the Bill to be an attempt to prevent the spirit of the Land Act (1870) from being infringed in the exceptional circumstances prevailing in Ireland. It was proposed to do that by carrying out the spirit of the 9th section of the Act of 1870 as it left that House and went up to the House of Lords. The Chief Secretary, and also the Prime Minister, had shown their desire to prevent the landlords from inflicting a wrong upon their tenants. The Bill was, indeed, inadequate; but still he should have supported it. But the Attorney General's Amendment had entirely changed the character of the Bill, and it was no longer an attempt to carry out the principle of the 9th section of the Land Act, but to amend the 13th section in such a way as to defeat in some cases the tenant's claim to compensation. In his opinion, this Bill would be utterly useless to effect the object which the Government, when they introduced it, said they had in view. It was now proposed to change the entire scope of the Bill by the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland. He asked the House whether it was worth while—worth all the time spent on the Bill, and all the fuss that had been made about it—to arrive at such an impotent conclusion? If the wish of the Government was not that which they expressed—namely, to protect the tenants who were unable to pay rent—but to get rid of this exception to the right of sale, he submitted it would have been better to have introduced a Bill for that purpose, and not to have introduced a Bill for an entirely different purpose. As the Bill was now proposed to be altered, the Bill did not protect the tenant. It gave the landlord the right to evict, and the tenant the right of sale. They knew that these small tenants had no saleable interest. How could they expect anyone to buy a small farm which was screwed down by a rack rent? From the nature of the case the tenant would have no interest to sell, on account of his having to pay a crushing rent. If they brought forward, on the other hand, a Bill to extend the Ulster Custom to the whole of Ireland as a permanent enactment, he would admit that that would be a measure worthy of consideration, and he should vote for it; but he should not accept it as a final settlement, nor as a settlement in part, of the vast questions connected with Irish land. The Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland would benefit a large class of large tenants who were in a different position altogether from the small farmers—tenants whom the landlords did not desire to lose—it would give this class the right, and the valuable right, of sale in their holdings. If the rent of such holdings was low and the landlord was a good landlord, then the tenant would have something valuable to sell; but if the rent was high and the landlord a bad landlord, this right of sale would be worth nothing at all. He wished to point out the direction in which they were drifting owing to the impressionable nature of the Government. He did not know whether it was by the pressure from behind or before, whether it was by pressure from above or “another place,” that this extraordinary change of flank was brought about; but, whatever the motive, he would remind the Chief Secretary of the old maxim—“Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel.” It would have been better for the Chief Secretary to have waited for a while before making any definite announcement. The Bill of the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) was introduced, and the Chief Secretary seemed to be favourably impressed; but a demonstration a tergo, and he dropped it like a hot potato. Now they found that another change of front had been executed, and the Government was going to enact something entirely different from its original idea, and which something would not have the slightest effect for the protection of small tenants in the West of Ireland. It followed, of course, on this Amendment that the whole of the Land Question would have to be discussed. The partial failure of the Ulster Custom would render it necessary to introduce Amendments. They knew that bad landlords in Ulster made the custom there of no use; and, only recently, the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) proposed a Bill on the subject. The Government said they could not go into that question at present, and he agreed with them; but now the Government, by this Amendment, had raised the whole question, and it would be absolutely necessary, if this Bill reached Committee, to move Amendments in the direction of the Bill of the hon. Member for Tyrone. He maintained that this Bill as now altered would result in either filling the poor-house or the emigrant ship. He could not imagine any more disastrous step than that which the Government had taken. They were extending the principle of free sale, and putting it on its trial for a purpose for which it was never intended and for which it was entirely useless. They were told there had been no anti-rent disturbances in Ulster, and that that was due to the Ulster Custom. But the Ulster Custom had done its work gradually, and, owing to its operation, it had become a recognized principle that the landlord should not raise his rent beyond a certain point, and that a certain saleable interest should be left to the tenant. He regretted exceedingly that the Government did not stand to their colours. Perhaps they were afraid that the Bill would be thrown out in “another place.” Well, he was perfectly willing to face that contingency. No great cause was ever won without suffering, and the Irish people, if they were determined to obtain a satisfactory solution of the Land Question, must be ready to suffer. They had suffered in the past, and they would have to suffer still. If the House of Lords, in 1870, had not mutilated that 9th section, he believed that the present pressure in Ireland would never have arisen. A sort of custom would have grown up by which the landlords would have been restrained by the Courts from raising rents to an undue height. But the House of Lords deliberately cut the section out and altered the Act; and the consequence had been that the people had been driven from the Courts and had to rely on organization and agitation. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had now been urged by some Members on the Conservative side to sit on the safety-valve, and he had done it. If the result should be that the engineer was hoist by his own petard, the weakness and vacillation he had shown would not entitle him to any sympathy.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not intend to make much allusion to the personal attack made by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). If he was conscious of having given way to anything except his impression of what he thought it just and right to do, he should have felt it necessary to excuse himself before the House. But, as his conscience did not in the slightest degree accuse him in that respect, he passed by the hon. Gentleman's remarks, trusting that they would receive in Ireland as well as in England the attention they deserved and no more. They had had three speeches that night, all very curiously different. The speech of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) was marked by his hon. Friend's usual moderation and practical sense. His hon. Friend stated arguments in favour of a special limitation of the scope of the Bill; but he would not, perhaps, be surprised if, after the two speeches which followed his, he did not say much about the Amendment, except that he did not think it would be possible to make that limitation. The object of their measure was not penal—it was precautionary; it was meant to guard against certain things happening, not to punish landlords for what had happened. It was intended to prevent landlords from taking advantage of the calamity of this year to take away from their tenants the property which the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Grey) acknowledged to belong to them, but the right to which, although given by the Land Act, required to be secured to the tenants under present circumstances. The hon. Member for South Northumberland had made an exceedingly able speech against the Bill. He had not said a word about the Amendment, although he had seconded it. He could not imagine that hon. Gentleman wishing to acknowledge the Bill even so far as to try to amend its scope. He hoped that the House would not expect him to reply to the hon. Member for South Northumberland, because he did not think the hon. Gentleman had said anything fresh that night, although he had reproduced with great ability the arguments used in previous debates on the Bill. Then came the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who said that his view was entirely altered, and that in consequence of what he called their change of front he was now opposed to the Bill, having before been prepared to support it; and the hon. Gentleman put on them great responsibility for the course they had taken. Now, he did not know what the effect of the hon. Member's opposition might be; but if its effect in the present state of feeling in the House in regard to the Bill was to prevent its passing, on the hon. Member must lie the responsibility of its not passing.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not say he should oppose the Bill. What he said was, that he should consider it perfectly useless unless with the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was very glad to have heard that statement from the hon. Member, because he understood him, in the very first sentence he spoke, to say that he would oppose the Bill. Now came the purpose of his speech. He denied that there had been any change of front either in their arguments or in their statements—either in the general purpose of the Bill, or in the explanations made to the House in support of it. The object of the measure, as he had endeavoured to state several times, had been this. They believed that, partly by the Land Act and partly by the history of Ireland, the tenant, especially the small tenant, had a proprietary right acknowledged in his holding. It was defined by the 3rd section of the Land Act. He must almost repeat the words he used at the close of the debate on Monday, when he said he thought the question which the House had to decide by its division was whether the landlord should be enabled to deprive the tenant of that proprietary right by taking advantage of the calamity of this year. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) in his speech had most distinctly stated that he considered the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland was really included in the Bill as it had been brought forward. [Mr. PARNELL dissented.] The hon. Member shook his head. He knew that his right hon. Friend believed that he had said that, and he wondered that the hon. Gentleman, who was as acute an observer of what happened as any other Member, did not apprehend the meaning of his right hon. Friend's words, and that they got his vote at the end of the evening considering the views he now expressed. The Attorney General for Ireland had made the same statement, and they believed it was included in the Bill, because they imagined that condition must be fulfilled before the tenant could receive compensation—that was to say, that the tenant should be willing to remain on reasonable terms and that the landlord was unwilling to grant them. They had always supposed that permission to sell the proprietary right was included in that condition. That, he believed, was the only answer he could make to the charge of having changed their front. They considered that they were by the Bill preventing the small tenants from being deprived of the property they possessed in their holdings. That property which they possessed, like any other property, was a saleable property; and by offering to the landlord the alternative of giving the tenant the power to sell or of running the risk of having to pay compensation, they thought they were entirely carrying out the principle of the Land Act, which secured the tenant's right. The hon. Member conceived that it would not be a saleable property. The point might be fairly open to argument; but that was not their information, that was not the deduction they drew from the condition of Ulster, and especially of Donegal. The difference between Donegal and Mayo, neighbouring counties, appeared to be this—that, in the one case, the tenant who had the power of selling was not turned out in hopeless poverty; and that, in the other case, he was. It was to secure, under the exceptional circumstances of this year, to the tenant out of Ulster that power of being able either to preserve his property or to get value for it, that they had brought in that Bill. Therefore, he denied that Her Majesty's Government had in any way misled the House or withdrawn from their proposal. The simple reason why the Attorney General for Ireland put this Amendment on the Table was because many hon. Members on both sides expressed their desire that the Government would put in exact words what they believed were the wishes of those hon. Members.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he knew that besides the attention which his Bill had received from Members of that House, it had received almost equal attention from Members of the other House of Parliament, and the number of letters which distinguished Noblemen had found time to write to The Times on this Irish Land Question, especially upon his modest proposal, went far to show that the legislative machine was very unevenly balanced, and that those distinguished Noblemen must have very little to do in that "other place." He thought it was very unfortunate that the Government did not accept his proposed solution of the difficulty in Ireland. The correspondence in The Times on the matter began by Lord Dunraven undertaking to challenge a statement he had made, that since the passing of the Land Act landlords had forced their rents to an exorbitant point for the purpose of thus enabling themselves to get rid of their tenants without being subject to any claim of compensation. It was not every statement that was capable of demonstration. Lord Lifford promised to vote for his Bill when it went to the House of Lords, if he could furnish six instances in which landlords had been found to unduly increase rents for the purpose of ejecting their tenants. How was he to prove that that increase was effected for the express purpose he alleged? He could only infer that that was the object in many instances for which landlords had raised their rents. His hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) had given expression to considerable indignation in consequence of the Amendment put on the Table by the Attorney General for Ireland, and though he had not the advantage of hearing the whole of his speech, he believed that unless the Government would add to that Amendment, the Amendment that stood in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), the course they were taking would defeat the object of their own Bill. The Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland would be intelligible if they were legislating permanently on the Land Question; but this was a temporary Bill to give relief to tenants in distressed districts. He should like to give Notice that when they did get into Committee on this Bill, he would move to add to the Amendment which stood in the name of the Attorney General for Ireland these words—

MR. SPEAKER said, there were several Amendments on the Paper, and that was not the time for discussing Amendments.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER bowed readily to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman; he was quite conscious that he was trespassing on the attention of the House. The landed interest in Ireland had been crying out before it was hurt, and the whole object of this artificial outcry had been to make the Government halt in their proposal to do justice to the tenants of Ireland. If the Government were to be cowed by the timidity of their own Followers and by the violence of the Opposition, then there was no hope for the tenantry of Ireland. If they adhered to the new course they had adopted, that would be equivalent to telling the landlords and the tenants to fight it out among themselves. There could be no doubt that the Land Act had not been successful in keeping down exorbitant rents. There were many cases where an agent took notice of the bonnet or shawl that a farmer's daughter used as she went to Mass on Sunday morning, and if he found a new bonnet, or a new shawl, or a respectable dress, he went to the farmer and said, "If you can afford to dress your daughter so well, you can afford to pay me a higher rent for the farm." He objected to the principle that the tenant should depend upon the goodwill of his landlord. Such a principle afforded no protection against a bad landlord; and the rule of bad landlords had banished 3,000,000 of the Irish people. The conflict of opinion on the subject was truly bewildering; but he would endeavour to deal with it with a due consideration of the arguments on the other side. The House had been told by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) and the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Gibson) that the consequences of acceding to the Bill of the Government would be to encourage the hon. Member for Mayo in the work of agitation, and that a revolution, and other terrible consequences, would ensue. But, whatever harsh things he had said against the land system of Ireland, he had never been guilty of using one kind of language in the House and another elsewhere. Whether he had addressed audiences outside the House, or expressed his opinion in the Press, he had never spoken in a different manner from that which he adopted in that House. He had always denounced the land system of Ireland. The greatest evil in that system was the accumulation of the land of the country in the hands of a small number of people. The hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Grey) had asked the compassion of the House for the widows and orphans of the unfortunate landowners of the country. But that was a small affair compared with the miseries of millions of the Irish people. The Irish Members had used no exaggeration on the subject. They had rather repressed their feelings. He had a decisive authority for the opinion he had expressed upon the distribution of the land among few people. He thought the words of Holy Writ, which denounced woe to those who added house to house and field to field, were especially applicable to the state of Ireland. It had been said that the country was over-populated. That was only true in the sense in which an hotel of three or four stories would be described as overcrowded if all the people who could easily be accommodated on all the floors were concentrated in the lower parts of the building. The people had been cleared out of one part of the country, and huddled up into another. He objected to the clearance system; he objected to the efforts which had been made to exterminate the Irish people. He would submit to the House the opinions which had been expressed by distinguished foreigners on the subject. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, in an address in which he spoke in warm terms of the Irish character, said there was every justification for an agitation to procure the emancipation of the Irish peasantry from English misrule. Mr. Wendell Phillips, an American of great ability and of the purest character, who was by no means a professional politician, had said that America was glad to avail herself of the services of the Irish people, and had profited largely by their genius, and that he wondered at the way in which they were treated by the English Government. When it was said that now that that House was engaged day after day in discussing Irish questions that Ireland should be satisfied, he replied that there ought to be no occasion for discussing them, and that there was no obligation on the part of the oppressed to be grateful because their oppressor was at length listening to their complaints. The only way to get rid of Irish questions was for the Government and the country to do justice all round to Ireland, so as to raise up a contented, an industrious, and a prosperous Irish people.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, no one is more sensible than myself of the right of the hon. Member to be heard upon any question he chooses to treat, and especially upon the question of land. But, without any derogation to my respect for his abilities, I do venture to call the attention of the House to the course this debate has taken. The question is an Amendment by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) on your leaving the Chair. He proposes that the operation of the Bill should be restricted to certain classes of estates; but we have travelled entirely away from the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, leaving his Amendment as much forgotten as if he had been dead for 100 years, instead of being living and likely to be long a useful Member of this House. May I be permitted to make a remark which, I hope, will not be without effect. If I understand the matter, this House is a deliberative Assembly. Now, what is the essence of a deliberative Assembly? It appears to me to be this—that a deliberative

Assembly is an Assembly that speaks always with a view of something it is going to decide. But if, when we have a Motion like this of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, we are to launch forth not only into a discussion of the Bill at large, but into a general discussion of the condition of Ireland and the land burdens, and other questions that have no bearing on the Amendment, so far we lose the character of a deliberative Assembly altogether, because we take up that upon which we are not asked to give an opinion at all. It is a matter of general interest. I am presuming to suggest to the House, therefore, that they have an undoubted title to discuss this Bill at large on the question of the Speaker leaving the Chair; but it would be convenient if we were permitted to dispose of this Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. On what has been said by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), I will only so far comment as to subscribe unreservedly to what has been stated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland. The hon. Member for Cork may see a change of front. Many men have a faculty for seeing that which does not exist. I believe he has exhibited that faculty, along with many other excellent faculties he possesses, to-night. But let us debate that subject when we come to it, and when we have some proposal bearing upon it. It has no bearing, and even the ingenuity of the hon. Member for Cork can give it no bearing, on the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. Although that Motion proceeds from a Gentleman of great authority, and who applies his mind with integrity and impartiality to this subject, yet a little reflection will let him see that not even an adversary of this measure can draw a distinction between estates where evictions have taken place and estates where they have not. Evictions may have taken place with good reason, and yet the disability would be incurred. Evictions may have been delayed on other estates from various causes, and yet they could be put in operation the moment this Bill passed. Let us put that Amendment out of the way, and let us go forward to discussion, when the House can deliberate on the question as to whether this clause of my right hon. Friend the Attorney General for Ireland is or is not a departure from the views we originally expressed when we endeavoured to impress the Bill upon the House. I think I am not making any unreasonable request when I ask on behalf of persons who are sent here not merely for the expression of opinion, but for the transaction of Business, that we may be permitted to dispose of the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire, leaving a perfectly fair and open field for those who wish to discuss the larger question on your leaving the Chair.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he was sorry he could not agree with the Prime Minister that this was a proper moment for division on the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire. It seemed to him that there still remained something to be said at this stage which could not so well find a place when the Bill got into Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had, with mournful tones and long-drawn visage, deplored the fact that two or three bad seasons would reduce Ireland to a state of beggary, and he attributed this to some mysterious and inscrutable disease, whose diagnosis must baffle the ingenuity of the ablest and best-intentioned statesmen. The malady from which Ireland was suffering was apparent, and the remedy was in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman himself. Ireland was suffering from an excess of rents, and it rested with the Government to provide that in future there should be no possibility of exacting such rents. The truth was, that the Irish landlords were open to the charge of rack-renting. The Land Committee of the Constitutional Club defended the landlords from the charge of harshness and excessive rack-renting by referring to the small number of evictions; but that was a fallacious argument. What they had to show was the number of times in each year the landlords had threatened to evict on process for rent; and, if they did that, it would place beyond dispute the fact that in the vast majority of cases rent in Ireland was only paid under threat of eviction, or threat of the seizure of stock, or the fear of starvation. In Kerry, last year, the Chairman of Quarter Sessions had signed 400 decrees of evictions for non-payment of rent. That was for last year. The Quarter Sessions had just been held in Kerry, at Killarney, Kenmare, Listowel, and Tralee, and there had been more than 200 ejectments—that was, about 1,000 persons left homeless. In one of the most famous dictionaries ever compiled, “rack-rent” was defined to be “a rent usually extorted by Irish landlords from their tenants.” In 1836, the late Lord Derby used the following words in this House in a debate on Irish Poor Laws:—

“He should have been most desirous of seeing a system introduced by which the poor rates levy might have acted as an absolute and positive check upon that which he held to be one of the greatest evils of Ireland as between landlord and tenant—namely, the exorbitant rents fixed upon. For now the landlord imposed a rent of 50s., knowing at the same time he should never get more than 40s., but trusting to what he could screw out of the tenant, willing to take anything he could get; while the poor tenant, from the great competition for land, undertook to give 50s., knowing well at the same time that he could not pay any such sum.”

“He could say, without hesitation, that he had seen instances of self-devotion on the part of the peasantry of Ireland which could not be met with elsewhere. He had repeatedly met with sacrifice for the purposes of benevolence and charity of all the little comforts possessed without hesitation, which reflected the highest credit on the humblest classes in Ireland.”

No one could charge the late Lord Derby with being an agitator. Would anyone venture to say that the moral qualities of the Irish people had decreased since that time? A reference to statistics would show that there was less crime in Ireland than in any other country in the world of equal population. There was no country of whose population it could be said, as of the population of Ireland, that virtue was the rule and vice the exception. Why did he say this of his own countrymen? Simply to lead the House to the inevitable conclusion that it was quite impossible that such a people could, as was pretended, have entered into a conspiracy to defraud their landlords. It had been said that in Ireland there was an anti-rent agitation, and a determination not to pay rent. He pronounced that assertion to be absolutely baseless, and a complete misrepresentation of the state of feeling which existed in Ireland with regard to the payment of rent. There was in Ireland an agitation against the exaction of unfair rents—a determination to resist the payment of unfair rents, and to brave the consequences of their non-payment. That feeling prevailed extensively in Ireland, and it acquired force and volume with the spread of education, of intelligence, and the acquisition of political power by the people. The presumption was entirely in favour of the rents being unfair from the circumstance that the landlords had the fixing of these rents. It was not in human nature to resist the opportunity they had of charging more than the value of the land. Many harsh things had been said of the tenants. To retort was easy. On one point, at least, there would be no controversy—that previous to the Act of 1870, tenants were simply robbed of their property in the shape of improvements. Since then the property of the tenantry had been appropriated by what Lord Carlingford called the silent process of rent-raising. In three Provinces, at all events, the Act of 1870 had failed to prevent capricious raising of rents with a view to eviction; and the landlords literally snapped their fingers at the Act. They dealt with the tenantry as if the Act had never passed. He believed the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman when he introduced the Bill were excellent; but his efforts had been ineffectual to protect the tenants from their landlords, and he very much feared they were now engaged in the preliminaries of another fiasco. At the meetings which he attended he had endeavoured to get a resolution passed to the effect that the eviction of a tenant for the non-payment of a rent fixed by the landlord was unjust, and called for the condemnation of every lover of justice. He thought the Bill, when first introduced, went a considerable length with him in that view. He had supposed that under this Bill a great portion of the rents of Ireland would be revised in open court; that everything bearing on them, in the interest of the tenant, would be sifted by skilled advocates; that the secrets of the Estate Office would be turned inside out; that the landlords would be put on their defence, and asked in the face of their countrymen why they should not be mulcted in heavy damages for being rack-renters. It now appeared, however, that they were simply to have the clause of the Irish Attorney General, which would enable every landlord to come to Court, and say he had agreed to let so-and-so sell his interest. No questions would be asked, and the Bill would simply be one for clearing off the small tenants in Ireland. In such circumstances, he very much doubted whether he should not feel it his duty to take the course indicated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR said, that the Amendment which he had originally proposed was coldly received by the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General, and the Prime Minister, in his speech, alluded to it as entirely unnecessary, saying that no Judge would refuse to accept the landlord's offer to allow the tenant to sell his goodwill as a just settlement of the question. He was glad to find the Government had now reconsidered the point, and that his clause had been deemed of sufficient importance for the Attorney General for Ireland to place it upon the Paper. He attributed that very much to the division on the second reading, when about 100 Liberals abstained from voting, or voted, as he did, against the Bill. Had it not been for that very ominous Government victory, which was like the victory of Pyrrhus, they would not have had that Amendment proposed. He was glad to find his Amendment had not given great satisfaction to the Home Rule Members opposite. If they had been satisfied with it, he would have taken the first opportunity of withdrawing it from the Paper. The Attorney General for Ireland, in his speech, had made some statements which caused surprise as to the relations between landlord and tenant in Scotland. He (Sir Tollemache Sinclair) had himself managed a large estate in Scotland for a great portion of his life, and he was enabled to state that a great many of the hon. and learned Gentleman's statements were inaccurate. The hon. and learned Gentleman had made some quotations from a standard text-book; but he had only quoted those parts that suited his argument. In Scotland, if the produce of the crops exceeded, by however little, the cost of seed and tillage, the tenant was liable for the entire amount of his rent, as he was if he had the whole of his crop destroyed by a bad harvest. He had seen a good deal of Irish land, and made inquiries as to the rent, and he could say that, so far from the landlords being amenable to the charge brought against them by the last speaker, the land in Ireland was rented much lower than the same quality of land would be in England or in Scotland. Most of the land in Ireland was let at Griffith's valuation, and a good deal of it far below that valuation, which, by-the-bye, was made at a time when prices were much lower than at present. He would boldly state that land in Ireland, in his opinion, was very much lower rented on the average than any part of England or Scotland. Hon. Gentlemen had complained that Irish tenants were rack-rented. No doubt, tenants were suffering very severely at present; but he believed that such was the state of affairs in Ireland, so much was the country over-populated, and such a large proportion of the people were unable to find money, that there would be great misery there even if there were no such thing as rent at all. Over population had much more to do with the misery of Ireland than any amount of rack-renting. Great complaints were made of the treatment of tenants in Ireland; but were they justified by the facts? In Scotland, landlords could evict at six weeks' notice; but in Ireland they had to give six months' notice before they could evict. Further than that, an Irish tenant for six months after his eviction had a right to re-entry on the payment of his arrears; but the Scotch tenant had no such privilege reserved to him. The Prime Minister, in his speech the other night, proved too much. He attacked the Irish proprietary, and he further attacked both Houses of Parliament for the legislation they had passed in respect to Ireland. If that legislation had been so unjust as the right hon. Gentleman represented, then the present Bill should have been extended to all Ireland and made permanent. Admitting that there was a certain amount of distress in Ireland, he held that it had been very much exaggerated. Mr. King Harman wrote to The Times the other day to say that 63 of the scheduled districts had been struck off his relief list of The New York Herald Fund. This showed that the distress was decreasing. Moreover, in spite of all distress, the Inland Revenue statistics showed that in Ireland each head of a family consumed whisky to the value of £5 per annum, besides brandy, beer, and other intoxicants. Therefore, if they chose to drink less whisky they could pay their rents. At all events, their inability to pay now was largely due to their enormous consumption of whisky, a consumption unparalleled in any part of the world. Then, again, so far as he could ascertain, the poor rates were not in any district of Ireland of an excessive amount. He was astonished to hear the language applied by the last speaker to Irish landlords, whom he had called oppressors and rack-renters. When hon. Gentlemen railed in that way at Irish landlords, they should look a little at home, for he found, on reference to the "society" journals, that a Mr. John Howard Parnell appeared to be one of the worst landlords in all Ireland. He regretted the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was not at that moment in the House to hear him; but the paper from which he was now quoting said the hon. Member's elder brother, Mr. John Howard Parnell, held 1,700 acres in the County of Armagh, and that before going on his American tour Mr. Parnell, M.P., collected for his brother the half-year's rent due in September, allowing a reduction of 7½ per cent, although the tenants had been previously promised 15 per cent. Although these tenants had paid their rents up to the 1st November, Mr. Parnell was himself one year and a-half in arrear with his rent to Trinity College to the amount of £1,500. The writer also said he was told the rents on Mr. Parnell's estate were 40 per cent higher than on the adjoining estate, and that his tenants were subject to certain imposts not enforced elsewhere. ["Question!"]

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: Will the hon. Member give his authority, or the name of the newspaper he is quoting?

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR: Vanity Fair. ["Oh!"] It signified not a straw what paper it was from; a statement was a statement. The hon. Member for Cork had never denied the statement, and until it was denied he held it to be true.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: Is the hon. Member aware that that has been proved to be an absolute fiction?

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR, continuing, said, the Attorney General

Sir Tollemache Sinclair

for Ireland had expressed regret that tenant right had been abolished in County Mayo; but he thought the worst system of managing land was under a system of tenant right. They had, to a certain extent, the same system in Scotland. On his own estate a tenant used to have certain claims for amelioration at the end of his lease, and the incoming tenant was consequently burdened with a large payment which crippled his resources. It was well known that capital to landlords in Scotland was only worth 4 per cent, whereas to the tenant it was worth 10 per cent. He thought the greatest curse of Ireland was this system of tenant right. The Attorney General for Ireland said that the landlords of Ireland had obtained an equivalent for this Bill in the shape of £1,500,000.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): I did not say so.

SIR TOLLEMACHE SINCLAIR said, that it must be taken into account. The Attorney General for Ireland further stated that the landlords in Ireland would be put on the same footing as other creditors; but he forgot to state that landlords were obliged to give further credit in land. There was a complete difference between the two cases. He also stated that he could proceed by a bill of civil process of selling up the landlord's stock of crop; but if that was so, how was the farm to be kept up? Other creditors did not care, and landlords would not and could not have recourse to such extreme measures. What was the effect of legislation proposed by Irishmen in the House of Commons? The Encumbered Estates Act was passed, and the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) said it was an extreme measure, and, if they went on as they were at present doing, they would see the land in the scheduled districts utterly unsaleable at the price at all. Even solvent landlords would be affected by the Bill. A great deal had been said about the Land Act of 1870, as if it were a measure of vast importance. But what did he find? During the whole of 1878 the paltry sum of £18,000 only was paid for disturbances and improvement throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. Therefore, this sum did not give the people an exalted opinion of this Act, which was introduced as a grand discovery. Not only would the Bill, if passed, ruin Irish landlords, but it also would reduce widows and orphans to beggary, and in time to come the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General for Ireland would think of the ruin they had brought about. When the House was in Committee he had several new clauses to move.

LORD ELCHO, who had the following Amendment on the Paper:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, this Bill, while departing from the vital provision of ‘The Irish Land Act of 1870,’ is not required for the relief of the partial distress now existing in Ireland, and will not improve the condition of the agricultural population of that country,”

said, it was useful that an hon. Member had had the courage to state a sound common sense view on this Irish Land Question. Where did they stand in regard to this Bill? The Government had put down with a great flourish of trumpets a new clause to the Bill; but they afterwards said that its principle was already in the Bill. He was sorry to say that his hon. Friend was prevented making the explanation he wanted, as he was the sole patentee of the new clause which was brought in by the Attorney General for Ireland, and this act on his part would be the first thing he would have to defend. He (Lord Elcho) had a very few observations to trouble the House with. The question before the House was as regarded the general principles of the Bill and the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell). In 1870 he did not support the Land Bill as a whole; but to the best of his judgment there was one part of the Bill he resisted to the utmost, and that was the principle of disturbance—the principle of payment for compensation by transferring one-third of the property of one man to the pocket of another. That was plain simple language except to Irish Members. He believed the disturbance clause would lead to all sorts of evils. The transference of the third of the property of one man to another—that was in plain Scotch or plain English or Welsh, but not in Irish, what the disturbance clause meant. He believed the principle was wrong, and the result would be proved by the fact that this wrong principle would be used as a lever and as a starting point for further wrong. If he supported, as he intended to do, the Amendment of his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Pell), he wished, at the same time, to guard himself in any form or shape from being supposed to approve in any way of the Bill brought in by the Government, Protean though it might be. He approved of this clause solely on the ground that it minimized, to a certain extent, the evils of the Bill. He did not know whether, in the course of any of the "pretty quarrels" between hon. Members opposite and the Government as to whether they should have the whole loaf or not, the Bill would not be dropped altogether. But, short of that, he would accept half a loaf, and he should support the Amendment of his hon. Friend. His hon. Friend opposite spoke of the relative position in which a landlord would be as regards other creditors if this Bill passed. He had a letter from a friend in Waterford County, and he said—

"It has been alleged that the proposed Bill will still leave the landlord facility for the recovery of his debt equal to that possessed by the trader or 'gombeer-man,' but of the two latter, the first can stop giving further credit, whereas the landlord's goods continue to be enjoyed by his debtor; and the 'gombeer-man' is so initiated in every secret of the farmer as to be able to strike at the exact moment when recovery of his debt, or its partial discharge—accompanied, probably, by some conditions still further entangling his victim—is possible. The inmates of the Union-house are less in number than at this time last year, and a fall in the rate, average about 2s. or 2s. 2d., is expected. There is not one of our local representatives who would like to make this statement in Parliament."

He should read to the House an extract from a letter written by an Englishman who was agent for an estate in Roscommon worth £10,000 a-year. He wrote as follows to his landlord, who happened to be abroad:—

"The estates are in a scheduled district, and your consequent apprehensions will be, I fear, but too truly realized. Already has it been industriously circulated among the tenants on no account should they pay rents; and on my half-year's rent day held last week—five weeks later than usual—for the purpose of receiving the gale due May 1, 1879, out of £5,000 I received £290, and the few who paid me were leaseholders at almost nominal rents. I yesterday happened to meet several of your tenants who to my knowledge have money laid by in bank deposits, and on my inquiring why they had not paid me their rents, they replied very curtly they did not mean to do so. 'Why?' 'Until they saw further.'" "You will," the agent proceeded, "give me credit for having kept the estate pretty clear of arrears up to May 1, 1878. On a rental of £10,000 the arrear column showed but £234—the lettings being all cheap there was no reason why it should be otherwise. The rental of May 1879, shows an arrear of £4,000. I pressed no one for rent who could fairly have been said to have suffered; and, besides, I forgave a half-year's rent to nearly all the small mountain tenants and those who suffered very much during the past 18 months. I was unable, in consequence of your forbearance and liberality, to send you one penny. The distress is now at an end, save in the extreme west, and a great promise of an abundant harvest, with good prices for stock and butter, made us all sanguine that 'the winter of our discontent' had passed. Calves and pigs, the small farmers' stock, never were dearer. A sucking calf is worth from 40s. to 50s.; pork, 60s. per cwt.; butter 1s. per lb.—the latter just double last year's price. Meetings have been held in every village, Land League branches established in every district, and the people told to hold all they can make now, and to pay no rent. Ejectment for non-payment is, as you know, the only remedy for recovery of small holdings. The fear of it has always exercised a wholesome influence. If we are now to be practically deprived of the only means we had of getting our own, and to which I, at all events, never resorted, save in extreme cases—threats being generally enough—I have no hesitation in saying we shall be quite unable to recover rents, and the results must be forced sales in the Landed Estates Court. You have 800 tenants whose average rent is £10; if to recover £10 I am to expose you to a penalty of £70, where should I find the means of satisfying such a decree?"

In conclusion, he thanked the House for having listened to him. He had read these letters in the interest of truth and fairness, and they went much closer to the point than anything he could say.

MR. MELDON complained that the discussion which had been going on throughout the evening had been a mere waste of time, and that it had not been directed to the principle of the Bill. All that hon. Members opposing the Bill seemed anxious about was to defer as far as possible the moment when the House would come to a final decision on the Bill. The question as to whether the operation of the Bill should be limited or not was a matter for the consideration of the Committee. There was nothing in the law as it at present stood to prevent a landlord recovering his rent as a debt; and, therefore, it was not correct to say that the Bill interfered to prevent landlords in Ireland recovering their rents. It left untouched all the remedies which the landlords, either in Ireland or in England, possessed at the present time. In Ireland the right of the landlord was paramount to the claim of any other creditor as long as the rent was unpaid, and the landlord could prevent any of the goods of the tenant from being sold to pay a trader's account unless the rent had been satisfied to the last farthing. He certainly found fault with the Bill for its narrow scope. He considered it was unfair to apply the Bill only to those districts in Ireland which by accident happened to be scheduled districts, because, owing to the way in which districts were scheduled in Ireland, there were many districts which ought to be scheduled but which were excluded. But that was a matter not affecting the principle of the Bill, and it was a question which might be fairly and considerably discussed in Committee; and if the House thought it right that it should be so extended, he, for one, should not stand in the way of that extension. But when the question of the limitation of the Bill was discussed at that time, he certainly thought it was not a question on which the time of House should be wasted. It would not be right for him to enter into a discussion of the various clauses which would be proposed in Committee. There was one which had been referred to and much discussed, and that was the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland. He thought that was an Amendment which ought, and no doubt would, recommend itself to hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House. It would afford in certain cases an immensity of relief to men holding land in Ireland, who were badly in want of relief. He thought it was a step towards the final settlement of the Land Question upon a correct and proper basis; and he should be surprised, when the House came to consider it, if they did not enlarge the scope more than the Amendment did. He thought it was wrong in a deliberative Assembly, such as that was, to waste time as it had been that evening; and he trusted the House would soon go to a division, as the sooner the question was settled the better it would be for all concerned.

MR. GRANTHAM denied that the Irish landlord by his power of eviction was placed in a much better position for recovering his rent than the English landlord. It was true that the English landlord could not evict in a summary way unless there was a power of re-entry in the lease; but he had no object in evicting summarily, because there was generally a sufficient equivalent for his rent in the opportunity he had of distraining, or in the valuation for tillage, which was made at the expiration of notice to quit. The Irish landlord, on the other hand, was debarred from giving that notice to quit at the expiration of which he would recover his rent, because he was subject to this heavy penalty, that if he gave notice to quit he would be liable to have to compensate the tenant for disturbance. In reality, the English landlord was in a better position for recovering his rent than the Irish landlord, because there was scarcely an instance in which the former, at the expiration of his notice, even if it were two years, 12 months, or only six months, had not an equivalent for his rent; so that he almost invariably recovered. If it was necessary that something should be done let them limit it to the cases which were referred to by the Leader of the House, and in which there was a possibility that there might be harshness on the part of the landlord. If they did that the Bill might do some good; but if they passed it as a general principle it would do immense harm. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) alluded with a feeling of horror to the emigration ship. He (Mr. Grantham) thought as the English people were sending pecuniary relief to their poor unfortunate countrymen in Ireland they should exercise some control over the way in which the relief was rendered. It was because of the improvident marriages in that country and the over-population there which had gone on for so many years that this distress was so great. In England there was unexampled agricultural distress; but there was no such distress in England as there was in Ireland, and that was because over-population had not gone on in England. Irish peasants who lived in huts might get better homes in our Colonies.

MR. W. FOWLER said, the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) was in substance the same as that which he (Mr. W. Fowler) had proposed as an Amendment to the 1st clause of the Bill in Committee. He framed his Amendment without any concert with the hon. Member, on the grounds stated by the Prime Minister the other day, when he said that only a "comparative handful" of landlords had treated their tenants ill, and that the great mass of landlords had done their duty well, and that he had no fault to find with them. It seemed to him, therefore, that they ought to endeavour to find words which should confine the operation of this Act to the bad landlords who had brought so much trouble on their country, and they ought not to punish the good landlords for the misconduct of the bad. Therefore, he approved of this Amendment; but he desired to say something as to the general principle of the Bill, many other hon. Members having referred to it. Since the Attorney General for Ireland had put his Amendment on the Paper, they had, in fact, another Bill. He (Mr. W. Fowler) was certainly surprised at that Amendment, for it seemed something like an extension of the Ulster custom to the whole remainder of Ireland. That seemed to be a very important proposal. It might be right or it might be wrong; but it was rather difficult on the spur of the moment to decide whether it was or was not right, and what its effect might be. He should not feel quite clear on that point until he heard what the Attorney General for Ireland had to say in favour of his Amendment. The great difficulty they all had to contend with was that of finding out what were the actual facts of case. For instance, the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) said that small holders would not be able to sell their holdings under this Amendment; but, on the other hand, he (Mr. W. Fowler) had just heard from one of the largest landlords in Ireland that some of the very smallest holdings on his estate were sold with the greatest ease. In fact, he told him that the very smallest were sold most easily in many cases, because there was more competition for a holding of which the value was only a small sum of money. Then, again, he was puzzled about the Schedule to this Bill. The hon. and learned Member behind him (Mr. Meldon) said that some districts were not scheduled which ought to be scheduled; but he (Mr. W. Fowler), on the other hand, could assert that some districts were scheduled which ought not to be scheduled. Now, he wished to refer to the relation of this Bill to the Act of 1870. He thought it was not a development of that Act; but that it was, so far as it went, a repeal of that Act. By that Act, Parliament said to the Irish tenant—"We are giving you a great boon—a boon not known to the tenantry of England or Scotland—on one condition, that you perform your bargains strictly—that you pay your rents." Over and over again the Prime Minister laid this down; but, by this Bill, they should declare that payment of rents would not, in all cases, be necessary to secure to the tenant the benefit of the Act—that he might be in arrear, and yet he might secure compensation for disturbance supposing he could prove certain things. So they took from the landlord the remedy of ejectment in many cases, and, what was far worse, they gave out an idea that rent need not be paid. But it was said the landlord would have his other remedies, and that a reasonable landlord would not be injured. He had made much inquiry on that subject, and he heard just the contrary. It was said that landlords were very timid; but, at any rate, he was assured that on many estates no rents would be paid till December, 1881, if this Bill should pass. In that way, if that were so, they were selecting one class and imposing on them a heavy burden. In his opinion, a great national disaster should be met in a national way. The Prime Minister had a horror of making mistakes in the expenditure of public money, and so had he; but he would rather run that risk than alter the principles of the law to meet a temporary distress, in a way which might be dangerous to the future prosperity of the country. It seemed to be forgotten how peculiar was the condition of Ireland. The ignorant people were encouraged by agitators to believe that in some way or other the land was to be theirs, and was to be taken away from its present owners. They forgot that, even if that were done, they would only have a new set of owners, and a new land difficulty 20 years hence; so the effects of this Bill were far more serious than might appear at first sight. The proceedings of Parliament might encourage false and dangerous notions. He had thought much on this question, and the more he had thought the more doubt he had felt as to this Bill; and he was, therefore, disposed to support an Amendment which would confine the scope of the measure to the areas where, according to the Chief Secretary, it was really required. He understood the principle of the Act of 1870. It was clear, conspicuous, and full of light, compared with the principle embodied in this Bill. He did not believe this proposal would really benefit the people whom it was intended to help. It was notorious that in a vast number of cases there were too many people on the land. However hard the remedy might be, the true remedy was that they should find a home where there would be room for them. Now he spoke with more freedom on this question, because he was a Radical Land Law Reformer. He longed to see the land both of England and Ireland free from the incumbrances and settlements and muddles with which it was burdened. But that was not the question of to-day. He wanted to see owners free; but he wanted to see rents properly paid, or they could have no real prosperity. If an owner could not get his rents, how could he perform his duty as a landlord? They must upset all their ideas about ownership if they threw any doubt on this right of the owner to his rent. For his part, he should be delighted to see a great number of tenants in Ireland become owners by turning their tenancies into ownerships; but if an occupier was to become an owner, he must pay his landlord a fair price for his land. He would only add that, although he felt the greatest reluctance to differ from the Government, he was compelled to record his vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. BRADLAUGH said, that the speeches to which he had just listened seemed to him to have not the slightest relation to the question. It had been repeated by hon. Members as an argument bearing on the question that Ireland was over-populated, and that distressed tenants ought to find in some other country the relief they could not obtain in Ireland. With the permission of the House, he would treat this matter as bearing on the subject under discussion, and simply say there was no Colony of England, no part of the United States, no place whatsoever to which any poor man could at the present moment go with any hope of benefit to himself. Those, in fact, who recommended emigration had not taken the trouble to investigate the matter, or were merely talking against time in order to prevent the Bill going into Committee. He regretted to hear the tone in which this matter was dealt with by the hon. Baronet who spoke from his side of the House (Sir Tollemache Sinclair), and by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho). It was said that these tenants would not pay their rents, though they were able to do so, and had money in the bank. The noble Lord opposite had told the House so; but if that were true, why did not the noble Lord allow the Bill to go into Committee at once? No damage whatever would be done, for the very fact of their having money in the bank would prevent their coming under any of the clauses of the Bill. To say that there was no distress when the late Government dealt with it as a matter of exceptional distress, and when the present Government had admitted that deaths had resulted from famine fever, was to utter words of mockery.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, though he should support the Amendment, as intended to minimize the evils likely to result from the Bill, he would, for his own part, prefer to meet the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair with a direct negative. He was very much surprised at the remark of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) that they were talking to delay the Bill. [Ironical cheers.] He was not surprised to hear cheers of that kind, and he knew exactly what they meant. But he was unfortunate enough to have been through the whole of a far greater famine in Ireland. He remembered the people dying by hundreds; he remembered, too, the sympathy that was felt for them throughout the whole country; and he defied hon. Gentlemen who had cheered in that way to contradict him when he said that there was not a single Englishman in that House who did not feel for the Irish peasant in the distress from which he was now suffering. But that was a totally different thing from assenting to the Bill before the House. The very temperate and honest speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) would show the Prime Minister that many of his supporters differed from him in this matter. Never was there a greater mistake than that made by the right hon. Gentleman in shaking that security of rent which he professed to establish by the Act of 1870. That precedent, once made, it would be most difficult to set aside. Upon the Prime Minister the responsibility would rest, for he never would have been supported by public opinion in a settlement supposed to be final in 1870 if it had oozed out that, coming into power 10 years afterwards, he would destroy what he had then done, and render those principles nugatory upon which right and justice were founded. The Attorney General for Ireland had said of the clause he was to introduce that its principles were embodied in the Bill, and that no County Court Judge, if a landlord agreed to give his tenant leave to sell his interest in the land, would be foolish enough to grant him other compensation. He looked in vain to find that principle in the Bill, and he ventured to say it was an afterthought of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had said that this was not one of those things which would prevent capital from coming into Ireland. He begged to differ from the right hon. Gentleman. He heard last night of a most remarkable case. An English lady with £160,000 had married an Irish landlord, whose estates were encumbered to the extent of £51,000. He asked his wife, after they were married, to pay off that encumbrance. It was a very improper thing, no doubt, for the husband to ask his wife to agree to do; but the point was this—the trustees said nothing could be done unless they got an Act of Parliament to permit them to do it. They got the Act, the money was raised, when in came the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland; the money had not been paid, and the lady had refused her consent. [Laughter.] It was easy for hon. Gentlemen to laugh, but it was an absolute fact; and he ventured to say the same thing would happen over and over again. It had been said that the tenants lived by the land; but what did the landlords live by? If they did not get their rent, what was to become of them with the mortgages, the quit rents, the county cess and other charges they had to pay? Was it fair to those men, whom they were bound to encourage, to raise a tenant right on their estates as the Attorney General for Ireland proposed to do? He knew one estate of 43,000 or 44,000 acres in the South West of Ireland; it was rented at £20,000. In 1837 there were about 8,000 tenants upon it. The landlord then died, and his successor was particularly anxious to put the property into good order. He did all in his power to get the people to emigrate, and paid for their emigration. At present there were about 1,000 tenants on the estate. From 1840 to 1854 the landlord and tenant erected buildings, and did all that was necessary between them. But from 1854 the estate had been treated as an English estate; and every single farthing for buildings, farmhouses, cottages, everything had been paid by the landlord. Upon buildings alone £55,000 had been spent, and £25,000 on draining. The moment the Bill was brought in the buildings were stopped; but the drainage works were not stopped in order that the people might not be demoralized. There had been no change of rent for 40 years, and only four evictions, two of them to settle disputes between tenants on neighbouring farms. Upon such an estate, where everything had been done by the landlord, to raise a tenant right, as the Attorney General for Ireland proposed to do, was monstrous. They had had a most important statement from the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell). He stated it was absolutely necessary, in the interest of the 250,000 very poor tenants in the West of Ireland, that they should either emigrate or migrate to some other part of Ireland. He preferred the latter, as that might be easily done, and mentioned 4,000,000 acres in the Midland counties of Ireland, to which they might go. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) would not go into the question now, further than to show that that was the only remedy the hon. Member for Cork thought there was for this very poor class of tenants. But they could not face the difficulty with the philosophic coolness of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. A. Arnold), who compared the population of Jersey with that of Ireland, and said there was room in Ireland for 35,000,000 of people. Surely that hon. Gentleman had never been in Jersey, or he would have known better than to compare two such countries. Why, in Jersey the land was let at from £6 to £8 per acre, and was cultivated in the best manner; the people were the most industrious in the world; and there was no agitation there. If Ireland enjoyed these advantages, and would use her industry as she did in every other part of the world, if she could be free from agitation, they might have a chance of seeing her prosperous. He would go a step further. After the Famine of 1847-48 Ireland made most rapid advances. The return of the Savings Banks, the state of the cultivation of the land and the cottages, proved what a marked improvement had taken place in Ireland. Their sympathies were all with the distress which now existed. They all wished to see Ireland contented, happy, and prosperous. They had now a hope of a good harvest. Their stock and their produce brought a much better price than this time last year. But as for this Bill, the more it was discussed—and he was not surprised that the Prime Minister wished to stop discussion—the more its nakedness would be exposed; the more the rights of property were shown to be dealt with, the more difficulty there would be in carrying it through the House. He believed it was unjust to the landlord, unwise to the tenantry, and injurious to the country at large; and, therefore, he should vote for the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) admitted that the concluding observations of the hon. and gallant Baronet were interesting; but said they were not very pertinent to the present discussion. There had been a great deal of strong language used against the Bill, but very little argument. They had heard the allegations repeated again and again which were made on the second reading of the Bill. It was said that the Bill must have a prejudicial effect in preventing rents being paid for two years. But there was nothing of that kind in the Bill. Landlords would have precisely the same remedy as other creditors. If other creditors could recover their debts, so could the landlord. The landlord had not only an equal right to sue, but he had the advantage of not being obliged to be in a hurry to sue, because, should any other creditor come in before him and seize the tenant's goods under a writ of execution, it must be on the term of paying the landlord one year's rent. It was only the unreasonable landlord who unfairly insisted upon the exercise of his strict right that would be affected by the Bill. But it was said that the character of the Bill had been greatly altered by the Amendment of which he had given Notice. Well, he had to remind the House that on the second day of the debate he had stated that no Court would hold a landlord to have acted unreasonably who had given to his tenant the option of selling

—if the tenant had refused to exercise such option. The tenant, as had been frequently pointed out, must first of all prove his inability to pay his rent. He would scarcely venture to swear that he had no means if he had money in a Joint Stock Bank. The bank manager could be called to prove that the man had a balance to his credit; and the proof would be as easy if the tenant had money in the Savings Bank or had stock upon his farm. The only case in which there would be any difficulty in proving ability to pay would be the rare one of the man who kept money in a stocking. The habit of the tenant farmer who could save money was not now to keep it at home, but to invest it in the Joint Stock Bank, or to lodge it in a Savings Bank; and in all such cases the proof was easy. But hon. Gentlemen stopped too soon, for if the tenant had even proved his inability to pay he should also show that he had made a reasonable offer, and that the landlord had unreasonably refused his terms. From the very first he (Mr. Law) had argued that if the tenant refused to sell his interest, the landlord allowing him to sell, no Court would hold that the landlord was unreasonable in not accepting his proposal to continue tenant. That was the Bill as it originally stood. Why, then, it would be asked, was it introduced in the shape of an Amendment? Because some hon. Members thought that the Bill did not make it sufficiently plain, and the Government had no desire to allow the matter to remain in any possible ambiguity. He (Mr. Law) maintained that it was in the Bill already; but to preclude all question on the subject he had given Notice of the Amendment. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) seemed to think that to impose a fine on a landlord who turned out of their homes poor people who could not pay was a manifest violation of all principle, and the transference of one man's property to another. But one of the cardinal principles of the Land Act was to recognize the right occupancy in the Irish tenant, and to give legal sanction to the moral claim for compensation for improvement; and he found in the Division List on the second reading of the Land Bill of 1870 the name of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire in the majority. So that the principle he now condemned was contained in the Bill which the noble Lord then supported. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) proposed to narrow the scope of the Bill, by providing that compensation for disturbance should be limited to the case of tenants on properties where evictions had taken place since the 1st of November, 1879. If there were any clear and satisfactory mode of distinguishing, for the purposes of legislation, the good from the bad, he would be inclined to go a long way with the hon. Gentleman; but could this principle be carried out with fairness? The test suggested by the hon. Member was whether there had been any eviction on an estate between the 1st of November and the passing of this Bill. But it was obvious that there might have been during this interval upon one estate half-a-dozen evictions of a perfectly justifiable kind, and upon another not a single instance; although, in the latter case, the owner might have taken all the preliminary proceedings for the purpose, and might have a sheaf of decrees for possession in his pocket, and thus would be free to proceed to evict to his heart's content the moment the Bill was passed. The Government desired to protect all reasonable landlords from being damaged by the Bill; and, therefore, they had imposed certain conditions on the tenant, which would, they believed, effectually distinguish the good landlords from the few harsh and bad ones. He knew that hon. Gentlemen did not like their land being touched at all; but if they would regard the matter in a common-sense way, they would see that anyone who objected to the compensation clause of the Bill as likely to injure himself must admit ipso facto that it was a question whether he himself was likely to act reasonably or unreasonably in dealing with his distressed tenant. There was not an Irish landlord in the House who would not unhesitatingly affirm that he had always acted and would continue to act reasonably towards his tenants; but if they were only reasonable, the Bill could not injure them in the least; the only way in which the Bill could touch them was in their reasonableness being subjected to the examination of an impartial and competent tribunal. He hoped the Amendment would be disposed of without further loss of time, and that the House would proceed to go into Committee on the Bill.

The Attorney General for Ireland

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, with reference to some of the concluding observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, I would desire to call the attention of the House to the very curious way in which the arguments adduced by the Government in favour of this measure are developing themselves. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has taken the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) to task because he says he is proposing an impracticable Amendment to meet an entirely imaginary case; and he says the object of the present Bill is not to deal with proved cases of hardness and cruelty or inhumanity on the part of the landlords, but that it is intended to prevent anything of the kind that may hereafter take place. Earlier in the evening the same point was very strongly impressed upon us, and we were told that no one suggested for a moment that there had actually been any cruelty or hardness or inhumanity, but that the object of the Bill was simply to prevent anything of the sort occurring. That is a very curious development of the main argument originally used by the Chief Secretary as to the ground for bringing forward his Bill. The first view of the Government, he told us, was that the question of the Irish land could only be dealt with after they themselves had had full time to consider it and to formulate the way in which it should be dealt with by Parliament. "But," said the right hon. Gentleman, "matters have arisen which have rendered it impossible for us to do that;" and then he referred to the recent evictions. It was upon the evictions that the right hon. Gentleman rested his case. He rested his case not only upon the greater number of evictions that took place in 1878 and 1879 as compared with former years, but especially upon the large number which have taken place within the last six months, particularly in the distressed districts. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire, objecting, as most of us on this side of the House do, to the provisions of the Bill as being of a dangerous and mischievous character, thinks that, as we were beaten with regard to the principle of the measure on the second reading, it would be well that we should take the Chief Secretary at his word, when he said that the measure was intended to meet the cruel proceedings of a small number of bad landowners who brought discredit upon their class, and that we should limit the operation of the measure to such individuals. If the statement of facts on which the Government rest this measure is correct, the proposal of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire is in perfect accordance with the spirit of the Bill. The measure professes to be limited in point of time and area; it is defended sometimes, although not always, on the ground that it is of an exceptional character, and that its operation is limited in the manner I have pointed out. Sometimes we know that it is defended upon grounds exactly the contrary; but, assuming that it is of an exceptional character, the hon. Member makes the not altogether unnatural proposal that if we are to have exceptional legislation we must mark that exceptional character in a clear and distinct manner, and must place restrictions upon its operation which will hold water at a future time. In proposing this Amendment the hon. Member wishes it to be understood that under the circumstances the carrying of it would be the best thing that we can hope for; not that he by any means approves the principle of the Bill, even if so limited. The hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Grey) in the opening sentence of his very able speech this evening, expressed himself as not altogether satisfied with the Amendment, on the ground that if adopted it would give too much colour to the Bill of the Government. For my own part, I must say that if we had the opportunity again offered to us of protesting against the character of the Bill I should be unwilling to give any colour to it; but, at all events, if we are to have this Bill, we shall do well to limit its operation in the manner indicated by the Amendment. The hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) has given Notice of an Amendment in Committee which is substantially the same as that of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire; and I think that it will be convenient to discuss the proposal of the hon. Member for Cambridge when we get into Committee. I wish now to say a few words on the general position. On the whole I must say that this has been a very remarkable evening. The whole of the proceedings of the Government and of those who are interested in the Bill have been very curious. They were graphically described by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) when he said that we have come this evening into an entirely new position. We are, of course, aware that it is not competent at this stage of the Bill to discuss an Amendment which we are informed will be moved in Committee on behalf of the Government; but I may be permitted to say that the change of front indicated by that Amendment is far more complete than the right hon. and learned Gentleman is disposed to admit. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland says that there is nothing new in the proposal which he intends to make. He says that the principle of that Amendment was, in the opinion of the Government, contained in the Bill when it was originally introduced, and that he is rather surprised that any person reading the measure should have been so blind as not at once to have recognized the fact, and that by the Amendment he intended to bring forward they were only putting into clear form that which they believed was already contained in the Bill. It is, of course, difficult to raise any question as to what the Government believe is contained in their Bill, because we know that it was drawn up in a very great hurry, and that it is far from being faultless. Nevertheless, it is a little hard upon us to ask us to believe that the principle of the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland was contained in the Bill as it was originally drawn. All I can say is, that when the Government first introduced this measure, they never put forward the principle of this Amendment, which the hon. Member for Cork City has described as that of "free sale." We have heard a deal about freedom of sale—a principle which the hon. Member for the city of Cork recognized as one of great importance, but which, he said, if introduced into the Bill, would require a great deal of handling and development. It never occurred to me, or to a great majority on this side of the House, that the Government, on the plea that it was necessary to stop evictions, were going to introduce the principle of free sale. I do not believe that Government themselves originally contemplated the introduction of such a principle into the Bill. Well, that is a very important consideration, and it shows in what an unfortunate position we now stand. The problem of how best to deal with the land in Ireland is one of the greatest delicacy, gravity, and difficulty, and we must attempt to solve it upon some general principle. Much has been said about injustice to landlords. I put the question on a broader ground than that. I ask, is this good legislation for Ireland generally; and, above all, is it good for the tenants themselves that they should be encouraged to look to legislation of this character? In dealing with these matters we ought to be careful not to be led away by hasty feeling, or by too great a readiness to join in sentimental cries. A few weeks ago the Prime Minister, speaking on another subject, observed that this House was too much influenced by feeling and too little by judgment. That is a besetting danger to the deliberations of this House. For many years endeavours have been made by Parliament, by patience and the adoption of good measures, to improve the condition of Ireland, to introduce more capital and better systems of farming, and, above all, to induce the people to trust to their own energy rather than to agitation or to legislation. Well, you are now going to overthrow a great many of these experiments. You are going to destroy that which is the first element of success in dealing with Ireland—namely, the feeling of confidence and security. You can do nothing in that country unless you can inspire a feeling of confidence; and it would be better that you should come forward with a definite and final measure involving even some reduction in the value of property, some distinct spoliation, or whatever you like to call it, than bring in an utterly uncertain measure which goes a considerable way in that direction, but avowedly does not settle the question it raises. The measure before the House opens a wide door, and leaves it quite uncertain how far infringements upon the rights of property may be carried. Now, let us consider for a moment the effect of this Bill on capital in England. I know that allusions to this subject are often met with something like a sneer; but I may, perhaps, be allowed to read a little evidence upon it which the House will find, perhaps, to be not without interest or value. It is in the shape of a letter from Mr. Freshfield, a leading solicitor in the City—the solicitor to the Bank of England, who is not a gentleman likely to entertain exaggerated views upon matters of this sort. Mr. Freshfield writes to me in the following terms:—

“I have to-day had a most striking instance of the inconvenience arising from the Irish Disturbance Bill. I make no doubt that the result has been foreseen by the Government; but, nevertheless, it must operate most prejudicially in business. In consequence of a death a mortgage for a very considerable sum—nearly £100,000—on lands in Ireland not in the counties operated on by the Bill has been called in. The mortgagor must re-borrow to pay off the original mortgage. I made an application to a well-known and first-class insurance office to advance the money wanted. The office reply that it objects to the principle of the Bill, and, regarding it as a concession to agitators, considers great damage is being done to securities by the mere proposal. The manager, who sends me this information by telegram, intimates to me that his Board will, in all probability, not entertain the proposal, which, but for this Bill, would have been considered a first-class security. The inconvenience to the individual is, of course, great; but it sinks into insignificance in the larger question of the distrust caused by this class of legislation. I am glad to see the Bill opposed, and if you think this letter of any service pray make use of it.”

There has been of late a disposition to make advances to Ireland on the strength of the improvement which was going on in her condition. But now you are unsettling everything. That is the great mischief of this measure—this hastily considered measure which has already changed its shape more than once, and which is now put forward on different grounds from those originally pleaded. We were told that ejectments were being carried on most rapidly; but the Papers which have been laid on the Table show that out of 1,700 ejectments there have been about 600 in counties which are not scheduled at all; and the largest number, I believe, has been in the Province of Ulster. My hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), I may add, has been told that he is quite wrong in the view which he has stated, and that the Bill has reference, not simply to cases which have occurred, but which may possibly occur, so that we are entirely left without any real guidance in the matter. What was said at the outset of the discussion has, I may further observe, in my opinion, intensified the gravity and danger of the position in which we are placed a hundredfold. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) gave us a not very complimentary résumé of dealings of the Government with regard this Bill; and he referred, especially, to the new proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, which, he maintained, opened up an entirely new and most important question. The hon. Gentleman, indeed, gave Notice that if the Bill went into Committee it would be his duty to see that that proposal was developed, and promised to move a series of Amendments giving it the application which, in his opinion, it ought to have. I think, therefore, that the situation is greatly changed. I do not mean to suggest that we should take a division on the question of postponing the consideration of the Bill for three months; but the question that the Speaker leave the Chair is one which, it seems to me, ought to be put to the House, so that we might come to a direct vote upon it instead of dividing on the Amendment. But, whatever we do, the House will, I hope, clearly understand that it is upon the ground of the new issue which has been raised by the Amendment which stands in the name of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that we deem it to be our duty to ascertain what the feeling of the country really is on this subject. The argument of my hon. Friend is, no doubt, perfectly logical. If it be an exceptional measure it ought to be limited to the proper area; but I do not see that the limits proposed by the Government are any limits at all. Their proposal as to the scheduled districts cannot hold water, and once such a Bill is passed you will never be able to stop its operation at the end of the year 1881. You will have opened a door which you will not be able to close, and have given to agitation an encouragement which you will not be able to withdraw. The Bill, I may add, is one which raises the most serious questions, not merely with respect to the rights of a particular class, but with respect to the prosperity of Ireland itself. If Ireland has an accumulated list of wrongs against this country, and if we owe her in consequence an accumulated debt of justice we ought to pay it. Evils, if they exist, which are the growth of centuries, cannot be got rid of in a day, but must be met by the exertion of those qualities which have been exhibited by so many statesmen who have been anxious to improve the condition of the Irish people. If they can be taught, as I believe they can, that their well-being and salvation as a nation rests in their own hands, and must be worked out by themselves on those true and solid principles which are held to be most valuable in other countries, then, but then only, may we look forward with anything like confidence to the regeneration of Ireland.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that there was one observation which he thought was called for by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Stafford Northcote). If the Irish people were to be taught in any way the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman called their salvation was to be brought about, it was not because the right hon. Gentleman or his Party during the six years that they were in Office had taught them that manner. The result of that six years was that they were unable to put their finger upon any Act of Parliament which had taught the Irish people to put any confidence whatever in the legislation of that House. If the Irish people mistrusted Parliament at the commencement of the Government of the right hon. Gentleman, they certainly distrusted it very much more at the termination of the career of the late Ministry. Every hope that the Irish people had formed of receiving something like justice from the Government that succeeded the previous Liberal Government was falsified. The discussion had wandered very much from the Amendment of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), and now they were asked to divide upon the question whether Mr. Speaker should leave the Chair. He did not know how many Irish Members were going to vote on the question; but from the consultations which he had seen taking place between his Colleagues opposite and the Tory Members about them he could only conclude that the course that they would take would be exactly that which they thought would be most inconvenient to the Government in power. It was, of course, in the power of his hon. Friends to falsify his prediction by going into the Lobby with the Government. This Bill appeared to him to establish for the first time a most important principle for the Irish tenants; if it were not intended by the Bill to establish a most important principle, he did not know under what class of remedial legislation the present Bill should be placed. If hon. Members from Ireland on the opposite Benches refused to permit the House to go into this Bill, when did they think they would have an opportunity of establishing that principle for which they had so long contended out of the House—namely, the recognition of the good will of the tenant, outside the Province of Ulster? That principle was now recognized by the Bill, and it was because it did so that he should support the Motion “that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.” He quite admitted that this Bill was not by any means a perfect Bill, but it did something which the Irish people had long required; it confirmed to those who lived outside Ulster the principle that had produced the tranquillity and prosperity that existed in Ulster. He heard the observation of the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), and he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) must state that he was not surprised at it; for he had never yet seen any measure introduced into that House which had received his approbation unless it came from some hon. Member with whom he was acting. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was not in the habit of judging proposals apart from their abstract merits; but when he saw that an attempt was made to put an end to that frightful system of eviction which had been going on during the past year he could not but give his hearty support to it. Before he sat down, he wished to say that whatever changes in the law of landlord and tenant might be made by the House now or in the future, he believed that these changes would be fruitless in warding off famine, unless the Government seriously considered the whole physical condition of the country. Ireland was a country which was saturated with water. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; but he could only say that if they could see the crops of the poor carried away, year after year, in consequence of that state of things, he thought they would be a little ashamed of their laughter. It was impossible that the population which now existed in Ireland could continue to exist in a condition approaching to that which a Christian people should do, unless something were done to develop the internal industrial resources of the country. He would guard himself against giving any countenance to the idea that the evils of Ireland were solely political. In his opinion, the evils from which they had suffered were as much industrial and social as political; and he, for one, would be rejoiced to see a Government in power capable of grasping this great problem, and doing for Ireland that which had already been done on a large scale for India.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that although he believed a very considerable number of hon. Members of the Party to which he had the honour to belong considered that, in the present aspect of the question before the House, it was more advisable for them to take no part in voting upon either side, still, while he could enter into their reasons and motives, he felt that he should be doing his duty better to his constituents by voting for the proposition that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair. He did not venture to lecture anyone; on the contrary, he thought that the speech—the useful and temperate and patriotic speech—which they had heard from the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) would have been more effective if it had not contained so many strictures on his Colleagues on this side of the House. He would venture to express his surprise that Members of the Conservative Party were apparently so anxious to have upon their hands again the Government of Ireland, at least, from their opposition to the existing Government on this question, it would seem to an unprejudiced observer that they were exceedingly anxious to have to deal with the Irish Land Question themselves. He ventured to think that, with the experience they had had, it would be much better for them that the Land Question should be settled by a Liberal Government; and he took it that although there was a good deal unformed and indefinite about the proposition contained in the Government measure—although the Government Bill was rather indefinite in the first instance, and the propositions it contained were liable to misinterpretation in their purport and scope—yet a good Bill might have been made out of it. But now attempt was being made by the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) to distinguish between the treatment of good landlords who had allowed every custom of tenant right to grow up upon their estates, and bad landlords who had not allowed it. He could not believe that the Liberal Party would ever permit the fact that a landlord had permitted a custom to grow up to be pleaded as a bar to compensation which was justly due. He did not believe that anything really Liberal in their Liberalism would consent to such a proposition. They had now only had the question before them on a Motion that they should go into Committee on the general substance of the Bill as it originally stood. In Committee important questions would be raised, and the details of the measure could be more fully discussed than with Mr. Speaker in the Chair. If Irish Members were still dissatisfied with the provisions of the Bill there would be plenty of opportunities for bringing their strength to bear upon the Government if necessary. He thought from the disposition of Her Majesty's Opposition on this side that they would be glad to seek an alliance against the Government.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that, as one who had had some experience on these Irish questions, he wished to point out to the House that the Bill in its present form contained two very important principles. The substance of the Bill was that, in certain districts which the Government were very careful not to limit too closely, rent was to be suspended. ["No, no!"] Then he must have misread the Bill, or have misunderstood it grossly, if the suspension of the means of obtaining rent was not vested in the County Court Judges. He thought, therefore, that he did not misdescribe the principle of the Bill when he said that it involved the suspension of rent. That was a principle totally alien to the Land Act of 1870. They were told that that statute would give security for rent, which would lead to the improvement of Ireland by immensely raising its credit. That was the plea upon which the Land Act was passed. Since the Bill had been before the House, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had given notice that they would be called upon to recognize to the full the tenant right of

Ulster, and something more in these distressed districts, where it did not now exist. These, then, were the two principles involved in the Bill, and he should have thought that the Government would have been able to meet the distress in Ireland by other means. He remembered the relief of distress in 1848 and 1849, and he was not surprised that they sought to avoid the abuses which then appeared almost inseparable from unconditional Parliamentary grants in relief of distress made by this House. At present, no doubt, the Government might well shrink from drawing heavily upon an impoverished Exchequer. Still he (Mr. Newdegate) thought that other means of relief might be devised. But let the House labour under no mistake; if they passed that Bill, though it was nominally meant to provide for a particular emergency, and for limited districts, they would establish the two principles he had endeavoured to describe, far more widely and, in all probability, permanently in Ireland—that rent might be suspended, and that throughout Ireland a tenant right held to exist or be created, not by custom, but by the gift of Parliament. Thus the tenant would become possessed of a right in his holding equivalent in security, though not equal in amount, to that of the landlord. Now these were not two small or unimportant principles; and, inasmuch as England was inseparably united with Ireland, he deprecated this departure of the Liberal Party from the doctrines of political economy in matters of property. They were rigid in their adherence to political economy—that was, to the doctrines of modern political economy in commercial matters; and no part of the United Kingdom had suffered more from the rigid application of the doctrines of modern political economy than Ireland. But he, as an English Member, looked with distrust upon the Bill, as a serious departure from principle in the matter of property. They had been told that the Land Act of 1870 was designed to secure the rent, while it provided for the limitation of the rights of the landlord. Where would that security be if the payment of the rent was to be suspended at the discretion of Parliament? He had heard it said of the land agitators that the Ulster tenant right ought—not by custom, but by legislation—to be extended over all Ireland, and they were now invited by Her Majesty's Ministers to commence the process by this Bill. He was not surprised that the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) should have accepted a programme, which he had been at the pains of advocating and disseminating throughout Ireland. Neither was he surprised, when he heard a Constitutional Whig, like the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Grey), oppose these proposals, and who spoke with the hereditary political ability, at the opening of the debate that evening—a speech which afforded promise of his possessing the political talent for which his family had been so long distinguished. He addressed the House in words of warning when he saw a statesman of the immense ability of the Prime Minister departing from the principles which only 10 years ago he seemed to have finally adopted. He remembered that, at that time, the right hon. Gentleman resisted such wild schemes, when enunciated by no less an authority than the late Mr. John Stuart Mill. In 1866 Mr. Mill enunciated this principle—that the doctrines of strict political economy, though they were applicable to property in England, were not applicable in the case of Ireland. He (Mr. Newdegate) knew Mr. Mill, and after that speech in conversation told him that his Indian experience had outrun his English political knowledge. He (Mr. Newdegate) would only say, in conclusion, that by the Bill before the House they were asked to lay the foundation of a system of feudalism in Ireland under which that which was now ownership would be tenancy in chief—the only difference between the present attempt and the ancient system of feudalism being that henceforth Parliament would be the Chief Lord, instead of the Sovereign.

MR. PELL said, that he was perfectly prepared to take the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman and to withdraw his Amendment. In two or three words, he could put the House in possession of sufficient reasons for asking to be allowed to take that course. There had been but slight debate upon his Amendment; but he had not lost much on that account, inasmuch as an important debate had arisen upon two principles embodied in the new Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law). Under those circumstances, it required no argument on his part to support the proposal that he desired to make that he should be permitted to withdraw his Amendment.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

LORD ELCHO said, he had a question which he wished to put to the Prime Minister—namely, was it a fact that the Marquess of Lansdowne was no longer a Minister?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is.

MR. PARNELL said, that he wished to announce very briefly the reasons which would induce him, and a number of other Irish Members, to leave the House without taking any part in the division on the Motion that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair. They felt that the Bill had assumed an entirely new phase and aspect, and it would be quite impossible for them to sanction the Motion for going into Committee on the Bill as it had now been interpreted by the Government, and as it had been further interpreted by the Amendment which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) had placed upon the Paper. They believed that the Bill, according to the construction now placed upon it by the Government, would not be a Bill for establishing the principles of free sale in Ireland, but for establishing the principle of forced sale, and that at a most disadvantageous time for the tenant. Advocate as he was of the principle of free sale, he could not consent to have the term used for a purpose, and in a way, which none of its advocates ever intended it should be used. Therefore, they felt that while they could not undertake the responsibility of voting against the Motion for going into Committee, neither could they undertake the responsibility of voting for the Motion. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister cried "Hear, hear!" He (Mr. Parnell) could assure the right hon. Gentleman he had felt very strongly impelled to vote against the Motion "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," and certainly if the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland were inserted in the Bill, he should join the Tory Party in doing his best to throw it out on the third reading. He, however, believed that the Conservative Party, when that Amendment had been inserted, would not be so anxious as they now were to prevent the further progress of the measure. In that shape, he felt confident that the Bill would produce more extermination and eviction in Ireland, more outrage and crime, than anything that had been done for 60 years.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am not surprised, Sir, at the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). I confess that when I brought in this Bill I did not expect any real help from him; and I was afraid that his views with regard to the question were different, and would be found to be different, from those held by Her Majesty's Government. What we have wished for is this—that in existing circumstances, with the present calamity hanging over the greater part of Ireland, we should guard ourselves against the interest in his holding which we thought belonged to the tenant being taken from him, and transferred to such landlords as might try to obtain it, owing to the exceptional circumstances which existed. I cannot be unaware that the hon. Member, from what he has said out of this House, and, to some extent, from what he has said in this House, seems to have a different object in view, which is, that there should be, practically, a prevention of the payment of rent for this year, and probably, for the next. At any rate, if he does not mean that, I have abundant proof—proof that would convince any hon. Member of this House—that that is the way in which his speeches have been interpreted by many of the tenants in the West of Ireland. That is not the object of Her Majesty's Government. Therefore, I am not surprised at the position taken up by the hon. Member for Cork City; nor shall I be surprised if I and my Colleagues do not, before the end of these discussions, find ourselves in the same Lobby with him. Perhaps, as this is a fuller House than it was when I spoke before, I may repeat what I have already said, for the information of hon. Members who were absent. We have made no change of front. What we stated in the beginning was, that we would secure to the tenant his property in his holding; that we would not allow it to be unjustly transferred to the landlord under the circumstances of this year. We were asked, what was that property? That property is defined in the 3rd clause of the Land Act to be compensation amounting to a certain number of years' purchase. We said that a tenant would have a right to that compensation if he could prove to the Court several matters—amongst others, that he was unable to pay from a failure of crops; that he was willing to continue in his occupation on reasonable terms—[A Voice: That he should pay no rent.]—No, we never said he should pay no rent—and that those reasonable terms were unreasonably refused by the landlord. A reasonable refusal by the landlord would have been where he allowed him to sell his interest in the property. We were asked several times in the course of the debate whether we meant that, and some hon. Gentlemen said we did, and others that we did not. Finding, therefore, that there was some doubt upon this point, we put it into a clause. The hon. Member for Cork was looking out for an excuse to stand before the people of Ireland—[Cries of "Withdraw!"]—I will withdraw when I am requested by Mr. Speaker to do so.

MR. CALLAN asked, whether the right hon. Gentleman was in Order in making the statement complained of?

MR. SPEAKER: I have not felt it my duty to interpose.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Perhaps I shall not be considered or stated to be out of Order, if I say that had the hon. Member for Cork City been desirous of coming to some satisfactory arrangement, he would probably have taken the same course as the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had taken with regard to the Amendment of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law), and said that in Committee he would oppose the clause, unless he had such additional interpretation as was mentioned by the hon. Member for Dungarvan—namely, that he must be convinced that a free sale did not mean a forced sale. That is a matter which would most properly come on for argument when we get into Committee. I have stated honestly the position of the Government with regard to this clause, and I am anxious to state again that we have done nothing more than elucidate the position which we have taken up. I will allude to one or two other charges of change of front that have been brought against us. The right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought proper to go back to the fact that the Bill has gone round without the names of myself and my right hon. and learned Friends who were the promoters of the Bill. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have known, with his long experience, the cause of that, which is, simply, that the Bill was brought in late at night. We expected the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) would move his objection to the introduction of the Bill, which he did, but unsuccessfully. I had the Bill ready to circulate; the names were brought up in the usual way, but the printers did not get them. I should hardly have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have condescended to mention that circumstance. There has been, absolutely, no other change in the Bill. It is almost word for word with what we at first contemplated. The only matter that might appear to be a change is this explanation of the last condition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon dwelt upon what he called the check to the investment of capital in Ireland. Do hon. Members suppose that this Bill will make capital less available in Ireland? It is true it may call the attention of capitalists to the subject; but if there be danger to the investment of capital in Ireland it lies much deeper than this Bill. Capitalists find that, in parts of Ireland, deep distress exists which may recur; which has existed for generations; which was far worse 10 years ago; but which is now less patiently borne by the people who suffer it. These struggling men in the West of Ireland are now able to combine together by the help of the quickness of communication, and by many of them being able to read, and all being able to hear what others read to them; and many have become more alive to their misery and more determined to get rid of it. That is no fault of the present Government, nor even would I say is it the fault of the late Government. This is a fact of which capitalists are probably becoming aware. We bring forward a Bill in which, while, on the one hand, we state that we must cause the law to be obeyed, and that we must keep peace and order in Ireland, yet we will, if possible, prevent the law from being so strained, under the circumstances of this year, that it should be used to take away the property of the tenants and transfer it to the landlords. Unfortunately, many of the landlords of Ireland disagree with us, though not all; for some of them—and some of the most experienced—agree with us in this matter. I shall not name the landlords who are for us, nor those who are against us. Hon. Members know that there are Irish landlords of great experience who take the same views as we do. Many of them, I admit, say just the contrary, and declare that their rents will be suspended for the next year or the next year and a-half. They have convinced the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) that their rents were about to be suspended; whereas not a single rent will be suspended, except the rent which is demanded from a tenant who is unable to pay, and which rent is proved to be an unreasonable demand. The Irish landlords are alarmed at this matter; but they are not the only people who have been alarmed, when they think they see the slightest possibility of anything being done which may in any way affect their interest. This is not the first time, by many times, and probably it will not be the last, when persons of a particular class or interest oppose a Bill which is brought forward to secure justice, and to prevent a small minority among them from misusing their rights so as to commit wrong upon others. We find Ireland very difficult to deal with, because of the history of Ireland. In one respect, however, it is easier to deal with than it was 15 years ago, because of the two measures passed by my right hon. Friend. In another respect it is more difficult to deal with, because the people, distressed and miserable as they are, have more knowledge, more means of combination, and greater access to the outer world than they had before. But there is no doubt Ireland is difficult to deal with; and what I complain of is, that taking all the Gentlemen opposite, above and below the Gangway, they do not seem to me to try to diminish that difficulty. If we bring forward a measure which we think but justice to the tenant, the hon. Member for Cork City and his Friends will not help; they will rather oppose us, unless it be a measure exactly in accordance with their own extreme views. If we bring forward a measure which is to enable us to enforce the law without committing injustice, we find that hon. Members opposite, instead of trying to secure that there shall be no injustice, and that the landlords shall have their just rights enforced, we find, I say, hon. Members opposite entirely against us, and encouraging what I consider to be a most unwise course. However, though we have these difficulties to deal with, we shall go on and endeavour to meet them as best we can; and I expect that one thing will happen before the end of this discussion, that, at any rate, we shall be credited with sincerity and earnestness.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he confessed he was unable to sympathize with the air of injured innocence which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland assumed upon the present occasion, because the responsibility for the present position rested upon the shoulders of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) thought he could show that in one sentence. The Government had a majority of 78 upon the second reading of the Bill, and he asked why had that majority dissipated? Did hon. Gentlemen think they would get a majority of 78 that night? He knew, at least, 20 hon. Members who voted for the second reading who would walk out of the House when the Question was put from the Chair. Why was that change in the situation? There was no necessity for the Government to make any change whatever. They were strong enough to carry the Bill in its present shape; and it was, therefore, upon them that the responsibility must be laid of placing the Irish Members in the position of supporting them the other night, and not supporting them on the present occasion. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had commended to the imitation of Irish Members the example of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), who, according to the interpretation of the right hon. Gentleman, had said he would wait until he got from the Government an explanation as to the real meaning of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. But they would wait before going into Committee, until they knew what was the principle upon which they were voting. Did the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland change, or not change, the principle of the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the hon. Member for Cork City, and others, had all expressed the opinion that that new Amendment did change the principle of the Bill. That, at least, proved that it was a doubtful point whether the principle of the Bill had changed or not; and, if it were doubtful, had they not, at any rate, the right to expect that the Government, before asking them to change their views, would explain clearly how far the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman agreed with, or differed from, the principle of the measure. The Government were responsible for the unfortunate dead-lock in which they had put the Bill. He would endeavour to explain how, in his opinion, the Amendment in question did change the principle of the Bill. It changed the principle by forcing upon the tenant the sale, or an offer to sell, his property under the most unfavourable conditions. It would be a perfectly reasonable thing to say in ordinary times that the fair value of the property of the tenant in the soil was only to be discovered by competition in the public market. But in what times were the Government legislating? According to their own opinion, and according to the knowledge of everybody else, they were forcing the tenantry of Ireland to put their property in the market at a moment of social and political convulsion. They were forcing the tenants to offer their property for sale when there was not the smallest chance of their getting value for that property, and when no man could bid for it, owing to the combination existing among themselves. The Government were bound to recognize the fact that owing to a combination, or, if hon. Members liked, a conspiracy, amongst the tenants, nobody dare bid for a farm vacated by any man on eviction. Under the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, a landlord would say to his tenant—"I give you the chance of selling this property. If you sell it, I will let you take the money you can get for it; but, if you do not succeed in selling it, I am backed up by the law, and can put you out without compensation." Supposing even, that the tenant was able to sell his property, was it not the position of the Government that they did not want to force him to leave his land, if by any possibility that could be avoided? Emigration was a good thing; but he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would point out that emigration, when forced by the laws, was little less or better than exile. The Government, he repeated, had made a change in the principle of the Bill. While giving a boon with one hand, they took it away with the other; and, although they strove to shift the responsibility for delay on to the hon. Member for Cork City, it was upon the head of the Government that the responsibility rested, if what was once a good measure should become meagre and untrustworthy, and be defeated in the House of Commons.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he wished to be allowed to point out that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not accurately stated the objects of the Government in bringing in the Bill, in saying that it was to secure the tenant in his property. That was not the object of the Government. The object of the Government was to prevent the tenant being disturbed in his holding, and that object they hoped to accomplish by means of penalties on the landlord, if he attempted to exact rent which the Government held, under the circumstances of the year, he ought not to exact. But now the Government were going to force the tenant to sell, and the effect of that would be to put into the pocket of the landlord all the rent which the Government previously said he ought not to collect from the tenant, and to turn the tenant into the world a beggar with but a few shillings in his pocket.

Bill considered in Committee; Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

(Mr. Dillwyn, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. James Howard.)

[BILL 253.] COMMITTEE.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title), agreed to.

Clause 2 (Definition of terms).

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, he was anxious by the Amendment he was about to propose to except from the operation of the Bill blackbirds, thrushes, and nightingales. He admitted that these birds were of the kind that those desirous of protecting wild birds would desire to protect most; but behind that fact a large number of persons entirely unrepresented in that House took a great interest in song birds when captured. The poor in the crowded streets of the Metropolis had not the means possessed by the rich in their country houses of enjoying the songs of birds in a state of liberty. It was a feature of the practice of training song birds that they must be captured when extremely young; just when they were beginning to fly, for unless they were taken at that time it was impossible to train them for singing purposes. There were, at least, 35,000 blackbirds and a corresponding number of thrushes taken every year in that way, which afterwards contributed to the happiness of the poor in the crowded streets of London. He was, by moving the exception of these birds, advocating the cause of the very poor; and he begged the Committee to think of the miserable and sick little children whose only pleasure, perhaps, while lying awake, was the song of the birds he had mentioned. He knew it was an easy thing to turn the amusements of the poor into ridicule, and that it was difficult to pass from such an important subject as the House had been considering that evening to the discussion of such a question as this. But he begged the Committee to consider the Amendment with reference to the circumstances of the very poor. He appealed particularly to hon. Members for Ireland for their support; and would remind them that he had often gone with them in division when in a small minority, because he believed they were advocating the interests of the poor in Ireland. He trusted the Committee would agree to the insertion of the words "except blackbirds, thrushes, and nightingales," which he begged to move.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 10, after the words "wild birds," to insert the words "blackbirds, thrushes, and nightingales."—(Mr. Thompson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. DILLWYN quite agreed with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Thompson) with regard to the pleasure derived by the poor from song birds; but he would point out that the birds which the hon. Member desired to except from the operation of the Bill had almost disappeared from the neighbourhood of towns. But the chief objection to the proposal, however, was that the exception in the former Act had rendered it ineffective, and the present Bill would be liable to the same breakdown if its application were restricted. He could not, therefore, agree to the Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. Johnson) proposed to omit the word "nightingales" from the proposed Amendment.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, the greater number of nightingales were caught in the beginning of April; and these birds, he would add, were very migratory. Blackbirds and thrushes were not so migratory as nightingales; but an enormous number of them came over from Norway every spring. For that reason there was no particular object in preserving blackbirds and thrushes.

Everybody knew that the country abounded with them, and consequently there was no reason for including them in the Bill. But there was a very strong reason for excepting them, as he had shown that a large number of the poor would otherwise be deprived of a necessary and innocent pleasure.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the word "nightingales."—(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 61: Majority 43.—(Div. List, No. 46.)

MR. C. S. PARKER hoped the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) would consent to strike out the wild goose from the Schedule. These birds came in great numbers to the coast of Perthshire and other parts of Scotland, and caused serious damage to the crops.

MR. DILLWYN pointed out that the wild goose got no additional protection from the measure than it had before.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, he would not move the Amendment now, but would bring it up, if necessary, on the Report.

Clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (POWERS OF SCHOOL BOARDS) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JAMES STEWART, Bill to enable School Boards to contribute to the support of Inmates of Industrial Schools in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JAMES STEWART, Mr. COWAN, and Mr. PATRICK.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 263.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.
